THE NEW YORK LEDGER

DEVOTED TO LITERATURE, ROMANCE, THE NEWS, COMMERCE

VOL. XII. B. BONNER, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, NO. 139 NASSAU-STREET. NEW YORK, APRIL 26, 1856. TERMS, $2 PER ANNUM, FOUR CENTS A COPY. NO. 7.

I AM SAD TO-NIGHT.

BY B. JOHNSON.

O, ask me not to dance to-night,
My heart is sad, my spirits low,
And one should feel joy's pure delight,
To prize the gay fantastic toe.
And sadness'd thought as ill befits
The form of mirth in place like this
While gloom in silence near me sits
I am too sad for scenes of bliss.

Those faces I was wont to see,
The smile, the laugh, the sparkling eye,
And feet that moved so light and free,
Are changed, grown dim, or silent lie.
Then, how can I be gay to-night?
While Time's dark wing is o'er me spread,
And manhood's care, or sorrow's blight,
But tell of pleasure, long since fled.

And while I live again those hours,
When youth and love together met,
I tread anew those happy bowers,
And sigh, and wish them back, and yet
Their fond remembrance is more dear,
The more I try to blot the sight,
I see those forms still hovering near,
O, how can I be gay to-night?

No, let no speed this hour away,
While others seek "mid joy its bliss,
I'd rather grief would hold its sway,
Than cloud my heart in mirth like this
Why should I mingle in a throng,
Where joy from folly takes its birth?
While I've no heart for dance or song,
My sadness would but mar your mirth.

Those forms I knew when I was young,
And those beloved in manhood's day,
Are welcome guests when scenes among,
O call me not from them away!
O, ask me not to dance to-night,
My thoughts are with those loved ones dead,
No, I would rock those halls more bright,
And move where spirits lighter tread.

WATERTOWN, N. Y., April, 1856.

THE GUN MAKER OF MOSCOW;

OR,

VALDIMIR THE MONK.

A TALE OF THE EMPIRE UNDER PETER THE GREAT.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1855, by Sylvanus Cobb, Jr., in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

CHAPTER V.—CONFESSION.

There was some contrast between the two combatants, but not much apparently. The Count was a little the tallest and Ravic was sone the heaviest. But to a close observer there was a peculiar contrast in the bearing of the two men. That breast, swelling out so nobly, and those massive shoulders, made for the seat of physical power, were Ravic's alone to possess. Yet Conrad Diamond was accounted a strong man. In the athletic sports of the club-court he had few superiors, and not many equals. But Ravic stood as tall power shown his strength there.

Now, for the first time, that contemptuous look passed from the Count's face. As his eye caught his antagonist's position—as he noticed the calm, dignified, quiet ease of every limb; and as he caught the deep, mystic fire of those expressive eyes, he knew that he had no common assailant to deal with.

At length Conrad Diamond started back, and a quick cry escaped his lips. His antagonist's point had touched his bosom—it had pressed against his heart, and had not been driven home. Well he knew that his life was his no longer, for the gun-maker had gained it, and—spared it.

"You have won," he gasped, struggling to regain his composure.

"You are not a novice," returned Ravic, calmly, at the same time allowing his point to drop.

"Come on," the Count uttered, now gathering all his energies for another effort.

And again the weapons were crossed. This time Diamond was more guarded. Before he had been impelled by his own assurance; but now he was forced to regard his opponent's power. Ravic quickly found that the other was more careful than at first, and he carried his own point accordingly. At the twelfth stroke the Count made a feint to the left—then at the breast, and then, with a quick, lightning-like motion, he brought his point to his antagonist's heart. But his meaning had been read from the first by Ravic. The youth caught the motion of the eye, and he saw that his heart was the place aimed to. His own movement was almost instinctive. He received his antagonist's sword midway upon his own blade—then moved his arm quickly forward and Conrad fell prone under his cross-guard;—then, with all his power, he wrenched his arm upward and backward, and the Count's sword went flying across the building. It struck the opposite wall with a dull clang, and on the next instant it was half buried in the snow.

"Fear not, sir," said Ravic, as the Count started back with both hands raised. "I never strike an unarmed man."

Diamond's arms fell to his side, and a deep blush of shame mantled his face.

"By St. Paul," cried the surgeon, "your life is forfeit, sir Count; and now you should be satisfied."

"No, no," the discomfited man exclaimed, starting up with rage and mortification. "That was but a slip. 'Twas a false step—a cowardly feint. I am not yet overcome."

"But, man of mortality, even now your life is Ravic's. He may run you through now if he chooses."

"But he has not," the Count cried, springing to where his sword had fallen, and snatching it up.

"Sir Count," here spoke Ravic, calmly, but with marked contempt, "you should not blame me for what I have done, for thrice have you tried to break my sword."

"Then try it again?" Diamond retorted. "Take my sword again if you can."

"Perhaps not," our hero retorted. But be sure your sword shall be used no more after this day."

"Ha! Brag not, but strike. If you can——"

The conclusion of the sentence was drowned by the clash of steel.

At the second stroke the Count made another furious thrust at his antagonist's heart. Ravic sprang quickly aside, and with the whole power of his good right arm he struck Diamond's blade close to the hilt and broke it in twain.

"My other sword! my other sword!" the Count shouted, now blinded by absolute madness. "Oh, give me another——"

"Hold!" cried both the surgeon and Stephen Urmn in concert. "You are mad, Conrad."

"Mad!—Oh, I shall be mad! Where is my sword?" the reckless man yelled, casting the blushless pommel down.

"But will you not listen one——"

"Away, I say! Shall I give up because my sword is broke? By the Gods, the weapon deceived me. Where is the other?"

"Deceived thee, Conrad!" repeated the surgeon, sarcastically. "By the holy host, had thy head but received a hundredth part of that blow, 'twould not be upon thy shoulders now."

But the Count was beyond all reason. In his madness he saw not that his sword had been broken on purpose. He did not see that he had been at his antagonist's mercy. But his friends saw it all.

"Ha! whom have we here?" cried Alaric, whose eye had caught a dark form at the entrance of the old building.

It was Valdimir the monk.

"How now? What seek ye here?" asked Urcan, as the tall, burly monk waddled towards the party.

"I heard the clash of arms, my son, as I rode by, and I stopped to see what it was. Surely, where the work of death is going on a child of the holy church of God may frame."

"Aye," cried the Count, "come in welcome, but meddle not. Now my sword!—where is it?"

Reluctantly Urcan brought forward the second sword, but ere he gave it up he said—

"Beware, Conrad. You had better——"

"Peace, babble!" the excited fool hissed, snatching the weapon, and then turning quickly upon the gun-maker.

Thus far Ravic had remained silent, but he felt it his duty to speak now.

"Sir Count," he said, in a tone so stern and authoritative, and with a look so commanding, that the other was held in obeyance by it, "I must speak one word. You have provoked a quarrel with me—and you have challenged me. I have no fear of death when duty calls for my life, but I would not die thus, nor would I slay a fellow-being thus. Six separate times to-day have our swords first crossed, have I spared your life——"

"Liar!"

"And twice have I had you before me unarmed," Ravic continued, without noticing the interruption. "I had hoped this would have shown you that I sought not harm to you; and, furthermore, that you were no match for me at this kind of work."

"Out, fool!" yelled Diamond, now fairly frothing with rage. "If you dare not cross swords again, say so; but do not crawl off like a coward!"

"One word more," uttered Ravic, paling for an instant beneath the unmerciful insult of the senseless tongue that assailed him—and he stood proudly erect while he spoke,—"before these men here assembled, and before my God, I swear, that thus far I have spared you; but my own life may be the forfeit if I trifle with you more. So now—beware! You have sufficient warning!"

Perhaps the Count really overlooked the facts of which Ravic had spoken. In his unbridled rage he may have fancied that true only accident that had worked against him. However, he started forward once more, and made a furious lunge at his antagonist.

"Now," he gasped, "play your best, for my sword's my own!"

But Ravic spoke not. He saw that the Count was stronger than before,—for his rage seemed to give him a maniac's power—and that he was earnest only for life or death. He struck quickly and furiously, and his movements were strange and unprecedented. He threw up all rules of exercise, and cut and thrust only in wild madness. Twice Ravic came nigh being run through. He lost all run of his opponent's play, and quickly saw that he must put a stop to the conflict, or run the risk of leaving a children mother in his house to see that day's sun sink."

"Will you give o'er?" he asked, as he struck the Count's point down.

"Never! Submit to such as you? Bah!"

A few moments more the conflict lasted. One more opportunity he had at Diamond's heart—and he spared him. All present saw it save the mad man.

"Fool!" uttered the monk, who trembled from head to foot with excitement, his huge belly shaking like a bag of jelly, "will you throw away your own life, Ravic Nevel? Shall I tell your mother you left her of your own will?"

This mention of his mother called the last lingering doubt from Ravic's mind. Again he struck the opposing point down, and then he pressed his own point upon the Count's bosom. He avoided the heart—he tried to avoid the vitals—but he threw his arm forward, and his glittering blade passed through the fool's body. With an expression of pain upon his features he started back, and rested his reeling point upon the trodden snow. The Count came furiously on again, but he struck wildly, and at random. Ravic merely warding off his blows, until finally his arm sank. On the next moment his sword fell from his nerveless grasp, and he sank fainting back into the arms of his attendants.

CHAPTER VI.

BEFORE THE EMPEROR.

"Is he dead?" asked Ravic, starting quickly forward.

"Hold, my son," uttered the monk, laying his hand upon the young man's arm. "Surely you have nothing to fear. It was none of your work—no more than as if you had run your sword to the heart of a wild beast that had attacked you."

"But I did not touch his heart," quickly returned the youth. "I was careful of that. I would have struck him upon the head with the flat of my sword, but I feared I might break his skull."

"He is not dead yet," answered the surgeon, as Ravic pressed forward and asked the question a second time. "He has only fainted from the shock of the blow coupled with his own force and passion."

"But will he die?" Ravic asked, kneeling down by the fallen man's side.

"I cannot yet tell," the doctor said, at the same time wiping the blood away, which was welling freely.

"But why not probe the wound now?" suggested the monk. "Now is the best time, for the pieces is not yet inflamed; and while he is thus insensible he will be free from pain."

The surgeon at once saw the truth and propriety of this, and he proceeded to act upon the suggestion. Having selected a probe which appeared applicable, he examined the wound. Ravic watched him eagerly, and with a painful expression.

"I do not think this wound is mortal," the surgeon reported, as he carefully felt his way along the course the steel had taken. "It has passed below the right lung, and only severed some of the smaller blood-vessels. I think, with proper care, he may recover."

"Thank God!" fervently ejaculated Ravic, with his hands clasped.

"But why so anxious?" asked Urcan. "You were ready enough to accept his challenge."

"Aye—else you would have called me coward," returned the gun-maker, with a flashing eye. "Had I refused to meet him that fatal word would have met me at every turn. I knew that such a man as he was no cope for me at any guns where strength of arm and slight of hand were required. So I meant to disarm him, and then give him up his life, believing that such a move would end the combat. You know how I labored to spare him. But I could not. Yet I would not have the life of a fellow-being—a countryman—upon my hands in such a quarrel. My father died fighting for his country—and so would I do if my death must come from the hand of man; but to die like would be a curse upon my name—and to inflict such death upon another would be a curse in my memory."

"I believe you, my son," the monk said. "Only if the Count dies you should not allow such feelings as you mention to overcome you. In no way are you to blame for this."

"True, father—you speak truly," added the surgeon. "The young man has acted most nobly, and no blame can be attached to him."

Ravic seemed somewhat relieved by these assurances, and having seen the Count's wound dressed, and assisted in bearing the insensible form to the sledge, he took Alaric's proffered arm and proceeded to his own team.

"Who is that monk?" asked the lieutenant as they entered their sledge.

"I only know that he is called Valdimir," returned Ravic. "I have only seen him once before. Have you ever seen him ere this?"

"Yes—several times about our barracks. He has been there when some of our poor fellows have been sick and dying. His seems to be a good hearted man, and, I should judge, quite intelligent."

"I agree with you there," our hero said. "I think he is a good man; but there is nevertheless a mystery about him which I cannot solve. His countenance is familiar to me, and yet I cannot tell where, nor when, I have seen him."

"Aye," added Alaric, quickly and eagerly; "that is precisely the case with me. I am very sure that I have seen that man under different circumstances. And others of our company have thought the same."

The two men watched the movements of the monk while they thus spoke, and they noticed that he entered his sledge and drove off towards Borodino.

"Ravic," said the lieutenant, after they had ridden some little distance, and at the same time gazing wonderingly into his companion's face, "you handle the sword like a magician. By my soul, I'll give all I own at this present moment for my commission and all—if I could handle the sword as you can."

"I do understand the weapon passing well," returned the youth, modestly; "but I have worked hard to gain the science."

"Ah—tis not all science," the officer added. "That wondrous strength of yours is a boat in itself."

"And yet," said Ravic, I have seen weaker men than myself who would overcome me easily;—or, at least, who might overcome me."

"But they were not in this city," suggested Orm, with a peculiar shake of the head.

"True, Alaric. I am not in the habit of mentioning my own powers; but yet I may say, that there is no man in Moscow who is my superior in the use of any sort of offensive arms."

The lieutenant readily admitted the truth of this, and then the conversation turned upon the subject of the Count, and the manner he had pursued with respect to the event which had just transpired. This conversation lasted until they reached the door of their residences, and having thanked his friend for his kindness, and expressed the hope that at some time he might have opportunity to do a more adequate favor, the gun-maker entered the house.

He found his way to his great chair by the fire, and he was pale and anxious. His face was supported by her hands, and all every sound from without she would start up with a frightened expression and listen. At length the sound of bells struck upon her ear—they came nearer and nearer—and they stopped at the door. She would have arisen, but she could not. With her hands clasped she bent eagerly forward, and listened with a fearful interest. Soon the door opened. Surely no one but Ravic would enter without knocking. She started to her feet—the inner door opened—a male form stood before her.

"Mother?"

"Ravic!—My boy!—Safe?"

She tottered forward and sank upon the bosom of her noble son, and while she wound her arms tightly about him she murmured her thanks to God.

By and by the widow became more calm, but still there was an earnest, eager look of fear upon her face. Ravic saw it, and he knew well what it meant.

"Mother," he said, "the Count is not dead."

"Nor wounded?" she uttered, quickly and eagerly.

"Yes—badly. But listen: I could not help it." And thereupon he related all the circum-

THE DUEL BETWEEN COUNT CONRAD DIAMONDT AND RUSSO NEVEL.

THE NEW YORK LEDGER

stances connected with the conflict. When he had concluded his mother pondered a few moments, and then she said:

"Surely, my son, I will try and suffer nothing from this, even should the wicked man die. In all you acted but upon the defensive. From the first he has only been intent on attacking you. And on the battle-ground he would have killed you if he could."

"Most surely he would, mother. Ay,—he would not have hesitated to stab me in the back could he have gained the opportunity. He was mad beyond all self-control, and his eagerness to kill me was only equaled by his eagerness for being overcome by one whom he had hoped easily to conquer."

After this Rarie went to his shop, but Paul manifested no great emotion upon beholding him.

"You seem to take it as a matter of course that I should return alive and well," said the gun-maker, with a smile.

"Why—of course," returned the boy, composedly. "What would a score of such men as he to you? Conrad Dumont? hold a sword before Rarie Nevel?—No, I only smiled when I heard his challenge. I should have as soon thought of being anxious about your return from a market hunt."

Rarie smiled at his boy's peculiar sagacious of expression, but he felt a degree of pride in his words, nevertheless.

It was towards the latter part of the afternoon that Rarie was somewhat startled by seeing some of the Imperial guard approaching his house; and ere long afterwards his visitors came to him, pale and trembling, and informed him that he was wanted by the Emperor's officers.

"Oh!" she groaned, with clasped hands, and tearful eyes, "they will take you from me now."

"Fear not, my mother," the youth confidently returned. "The Emperor will not blame me when he knows all the particulars.—But come—let us go in."

Rarie found the officers—three of them—in the kitchen, and he asked them if they sought him.

"We seek Rarie Nevel, the gun-maker," rehurned the leader.

"I am the man, sir. May I know what is wanted?"

"Cannot you guess?"

"Why—yes. I suppose it must be on account of the duel which was fought this morning."

"Exactly."

"And who wants me?"

"He should want you but the Emperor?"

"Oh! they will not take my noble boy from me!" cried Claudia, catching the officer by the arm. "Tell our good Emperor that Rarie has taken my husband from me—that he fell in his country's cause. Tell him my boy was not to blame—"

"Hush, mother," interposed Rarie. "Fear not you."

"Come," said the leader. "It is growing late, and Peter will not brook delay."

"But they will not harm him?" the mother frantically cried, clinging now to her son.

"No, no, my mother. Rest you easy here until I return." And then turning to the guard he added,—"Lead on, and I will follow."

"Now rest you easy, my dear mother;" and with these words Rarie gently laid her back into her chair, and then hastened out after the officers. In the entry he put on his bonnet and jerkin, and then followed his conductors out to the street, where stood a double sledge, with two horses attached.

You seem to look upon the killing of a Russian nobleman as a very small affair," said one of the officers, after they had started on their way.

"Is he dead, then?" Rarie quickly asked.

"The doctors think his case a critical one. But that is not the thing: You would have killed him if you could."

"No, no, Sir Bayard, 'tis not so. All who were present will swear that I tried to spare him."

"Very well," returned the officer. "We shall see about that when we come to the palace. Perhaps you may go clear—but, upon my soul, I would not willingly carry your place."

Rarie cared not to pursue the point with those who knew nothing about the circumstances, so he remained silent during the rest of the ride. It was near sundown when they reached the Imperial Palace, and Rarie was conducted at once into the Emperor's presence.

The Emperor Peter was in one of the smaller audience chambers, sitting at a large table covered with purple velvet heavily wrought with gold, and upon either hand stood some of his private attendants. He looked very young, and yet so old as Rarie by some three years, but his face already wore a mature look. His frame was solid, but not large—being rather slight than otherwise in physical bulk. His dress betrayed negligence and carelessness, and was in marked contrast with the rich garbs of his attendants. Such was Peter of Russia—yet a youth—small in frame, and careless of those graces which go to make up the sum of court life; but still able to bear the affairs of a great nation upon his shoulders. Within that head worked a mighty brain, and in that bosom beat a heart throbbing more for the good of Russia than for self or kindred.

Rarie saw Stephen Urnen and the surgeon there; and he also saw the Duke of Tula there. He met the Duke's eye, and a peculiar sensation of fear ran through his mind as he saw the stern, threatening expression that rested upon Olga's face.

"Sire," spoke the leader of those who had conducted the prisoner thither, "Rarie Nevel stands before you.

"Ah," uttered Peter, casting his eagle eye over the form before him. "Nevel—advance."

With a bold, yet modest step, Rarie advanced to the table, and with a low bow he recalled the Emperor's presence. There was a shudder apparent in the frames of those who visited the prisoner well, for well they knew their mighty ruler's ire was not slumbers of legal purpose.

CHAPTER VII.
A STARTLING TRIAL.

In order to understand the circumstances under which Rarie was brought before the Emperor it will be necessary to go back a few hours. The surgeon had consulted well for the surgeon, Kopasl, who had attended at the duel, and as he was some time in answering the summons he was questioned when he did come, concerning his hardness. His answer was, that he had been attending the Count Dumont.

"And what ails the Count?" asked the Emperor. "He was well yesterday."

"Yes—but he has met with an accident to-day."

"Look ye, Kopasl," the young ruler cried, who saw in an instant that something unusual had happened, "think not to conceal anything from me. What is it, pray?"

"Sire, I meant not to hide anything from you. The Count has been engaged in a duel."

"Ha!—was he challenged?"

"No, sire—he was the challenger."

"So, so. And who was the other party?"

"An humble gun-maker, sire, named Rarie Nevel."

"Nevel—Nevel—" soliloquized Peter. "The name is familiar."

"His father was a captain in the hat war with the Turks. He arose from the ranks under Feodor, and was one of the bravest of the brave."

"Captain Nevel—Ah, yes. I remember now. He and Valdai were the two who first mounted the ramparts at Isiam. So the old despatches read."

"Yes, sire. Peter Nevel was shot a month afterwards while leading his brave company against a whole squadron of Turkish infantry, which Valdai came home and got a colonel's commission."

"And afterwards received a title," added Peter.

"Yes, sire."

"And this gun-maker is this captain's son?"

"Yes, sire."

"And methinks Valdai left a child."

"He did, sire—a daughter, who is now with Olga—she is his ward."

"Yes, yes.—And the Count fought a duel with young Nevel, and got beaten, eh?"

Before the surgeon could answer a page entered the chamber and announced that the Duke of Tula wished to see his Imperial master.

The Emperor directed that he should be admitted; and ere long afterwards Prince Paul Dukeentered the apartment. He was a tall, stout man, with light hair, and blue eyes, and he was from-ty-and-forty years of age. His bearing was haughty, though he was forced to a show of respect now that he was before his master.

"Sire," spoke the Duke, after the usual salutations had passed, "I come to you for summary justice at thy hands. My young friend, the Count Conrad Dumont, has been most brutally murdered."

"Ha!" Say you so, Olga?"

"Yes, sire."

"But how was it?"

"Thus it was, sire': On the day before yesterday Conrad the Count with a message to one Rarie Nevel, who is a gun-maker in the Sloboda. He went as I wished, and while there, the gun-maker, who is a huge fellow, provoked a quarrel, and knocked the nobleman down. Of course the Count was offended, and as the ruffian threatened to repeat the offence, and as he furthermore grossly insulted a noble lady whom the Count held most dear, he could hardly help challenging him. The fellow accepted the challenge; and his succeeded, by the most cowardly maneuvering, in inflicting upon his a mortal wound."

"This is a serious affair," said the Emperor, who had not failed to notice the astonished look of the surgeon while the Duke was telling his story.

"It is most serious, sire; and surely the ruffian should be at once executed."

"But did you not say that the Count challenged him?"

"I did, sire; but you must remember that it was an instinct of self-preservation with the noble Count. He knew the character of the cowardly murdered him but he not taken this course."

"Were you present at the duel, my lord?"

"No, sire, no; I have a young man, and not yet so old as Rarie by some three years, but his face already wore a mature look. His frame was solid, but not large—being rather slight than otherwise in physical bulk. His dress betrayed negligence and carelessness, and was in marked contrast with the rich garbs of his attendants. Such was Peter of Russia—yet a youth—small in frame, and careless of those graces which go to make up the sum of court life; but still able to bear the affairs of a great nation upon his shoulders. Within that head worked a mighty brain, and in that bosom beat a heart throbbing more for the good of Russia than for self or kindred.

Rarie saw Stephen Urnen and the surgeon there; and he also saw the Duke of Tula there. He met the Duke's eye, and a peculiar sensation of fear ran through his mind as he saw the stern, threatening expression that rested upon Olga's face.

"Sire," spoke the leader of those who had conducted the prisoner thither, "Rarie Nevel stands before you.

"Ah," uttered Peter, casting his eagle eye over the form before him. "Nevel—advance."

With a bold, yet modest step, Rarie ad-

"Yes, sire."

"Why—he is the best swordsman in by empire. I think our young adventurer would have badly in his hands."

"Never mind, sire; you could judge."

"Why," said Peter, with a smile, "Demetrius handles the Count as I would a saucy child."

"Sire," spoke Rurie, modestly, but yet frankly, "I would surely no disgrace to be overcome by your tutor."

"And will you take a turn with him at the swords?"

"Yes, sire—if so it please you."

"By my soul," cried the Emperor, leaping up, "we'll have some diversion out of this trial. What ho, there! Light up the chamber.—Let every lamp be lighted, for we must fight now. Send Demetrius here—and tell him to bring his round-edged swords!"

Rarie and Duke and Urnen stood aghast at this new turn, but they dared not interfere, for they saw that their imperial master was all excited—save to see a trial of skill at that science which, above all others, he tried to make his officers learn of physical work. But then they had one hope: Demetrius might overcome the gun-maker so easily that Peter should not see his real power.

Demetrius soon came, and under his arm he carried the swords. They were of the common size, but with round edges and points on purpose for play. The masters-at-arms was a powerfully built man, and possessed a splendid form. He was a Greek by birth, and now was retained by the Emperor as a teacher of the sword exercise.

"Demetrius," said Peter, "I have sent for you to entertain us with a show of your skill. Here is a man about whose power there is much doubt. Mind you—it is all in play with—Rurie Nevel, take your weapon."

The youth stepped forward and extended his left hand for the sword, and the right hand he extended for the other to grasp. It was taken from the hilt of the sword in an instant that he and a noble man to deal with. And those two men were not much unlike in form. Demetrius was the taller, but Rarie showed the most muscle.

The light had come on, but the great lamps were all lighted, and the room was as bright as day.

"Sir," said Rurie, addressing the Greek, "this is none of my seeking, though I will confess that for a long while I have longed to cross the broad sword with a player with skill."

"I like you," the Greek returned, bluntly and kindly; "and if you beat me I will not like you less. I am afraid to be beat when I know that thou far I have never been since first I offered to fence."

"Come, come," cried Peter, who was impatient for the entertainment, "let's see the beginning. Now—the noble gentlemen—ha!"

Like two twins stood these swordsmen as their weapons crossed with a clear, sharp clang. The Greek led off carefully, and Rurie as carefully warded every stroke. Then the former assumed a guard, and Rurie led off in turn. Then the swords clashed with sharper ring, and soon sparks of fire flew out from the clanging steel. Louder and louder grew the clang, faster and quicker grew the strokes. The by thrusts were made with skill and force, but as yet neither had been touched.

The Emperor was in extacy. He clapped his hands and shouted from with all his might. He stood in his chair, and his eyes were intent in its meaning fire. His opponent saw it, but he could not tell what it meant. The youth was about to rush for cover during the pause, he knew. Steadily burned his eye, and his lips were set like steel. At length he saw that the Greek was playing for a trick, and he learned his point. Demetrius saw the chance, and drawing his arm quickly back he made the thrust—with all his power. He was sure now he had won, for there was no earthly way in which his point could be struck either down or up. But see! With a glitting—a motion almost imperceptible—Rurie raises his sword, and the other slides along upon his arm, and the other point, instead of touching his breast, is caught in the cross-guard of his hilt. The sword was lightning, and with all his might Rurie bends his elbow downward with the whole weight of his massive shoulder, and thrown his weapon upward. The Greek's sword was seen and feels what meant that strange fire of the eye. He feels his point caught, but before he can wrest his grasp sure from the hilt it is wrenched from his hand—it strikes the vaulted roof of the hall, and, descending, is caught by Rurie Nevel fairly by the hilt!

For a moment all is still as death in that chamber. Rurie is the first to break the silence. He advances to the Greek, and, as he bends back both the swords, he says,—

"Sir, I crave your pardon."

"By heavens, no!" the noble Greek cries, dropping both the swords, and extending both hands, which the gun-maker grasps.

"By heavens, no!" the noble Greek cries, dropping both the swords, and extending both hands, which the gun-maker grasps. "I honor you—I love you."

TO BE CONTINUED IN OUR NEXT.

WOMAN'S WILL.

Dip the Atlantic ocean dry with a teaspoon; twist your hot into the toe of your boot; make gentlemen perform their promises; and subscribers pay the printer; send up fishing-hooks with balloons, and fish for stars; get astride of a pleasure and chase a comet; whose the rain is coming down like the cataract of Niagara, remember where you left your umbrella; choke a mosquito with a bolshbat; in short, prove all things hitherto considered impossible, to be possible, but never attempt to coax a woman to say she will, when she has made up her mind to say she won't.

A HOME OF YOUR OWN.

Every person should have a home of their own,—a place where they know bright eyes are watching for them, and a warm welcome awaiting them, a place where they can cast off their cares, forget their business perplexities, and enjoy the many delights that clurie around a happy circle; a haven where they can moor their tempest-tossed bark, and revel in the balmy breezes that sweep over life's ocean.

And such a place as home—a home of your own, reared by your weary toil, and looked after with love tempting through the dim vista of coming years.

Around it will cluster sweet memories, and blessed joys, too often unappreciated till they have fled.

No matter how humble it be, if it is only your own. It will be your guardian angel through life, and its joys will cheer you in your declining years, its delights every day twining closer about your heart, until their support fails through death, when the golden links will be united in a chain of exceeding brightness in Heaven.

Yes, have a home of your own. Let a gentle being preside at its hearthstone; and as smiling cherubs make music in its chambers with their silvery laughter. You will soon learn to love it, and will feel that you become invested every sweet memory that binds you to earth; it will be the silent witness of your joys and griefs, your triumphs and defeats.—Sunday Times.

SWALLOWON, OWEGO, THIOS Co., N.Y.

FASHIONS IN DRESS.

In no instance have the daily and fluctuations of a large portion of mankind been more strikingly displayed than in those various, occasionally very opposite, modes in which they have been from time to time adopted, and sought distinction, even in deformity. Thus, while one race of people make the feet of the children, another flattens their noses between two boards; and while we in Europe admire the natural whiteness of the skin, the Malays fob off the enamel and dye them black, for the all-sufficient reason that dog's teeth are white. A New Zealand chief has his tattooed coat of arms emblazoned on the skin of his face as well as his limbs; and an Esquimaux is notched on the outer rim of his right ear through a hole in each cheek. Quite as absurd, and still more mischievous is the infatuation which, in some civilized nations attaches beauty to that modification of the human figure which compresses the waist, and expands the hips, until the very ribs have been distorted, and the functions of the vital organs irreparably disordered.

ANTIQUITY OF PORCELAIN.

Porcelain, by which is designated a dense body too hard to be scratched by a knife, translucent, sonorous and white, was manufactured from a very early period in China. The remote antiquity of this manufacture is proved by the discovery of bodies of Chinese porcelain, with inscriptions in that language, in the tombs of Thebes. The porcelain tower near Nankin was built A. D. 1412, and not as early as 163 B. C. It is stated that porcelain was common in China. Marco Polo, the Venetian traveler, found this China in the thirteenth century, and he describes with much accuracy the mode in which the kaolin, or porcelain clay, is prepared for their clays. "They collect," he says, "a certain kind of earth, as it were found in mines, and lay it in heaps and long suffer it to be exposed to the wind, rain, and sun, for thirty or forty years, during which time the material is never disturbed. By means, it becomes refined and fit for being wrought into the vessels above mentioned. Such colors as may be thought proper are laid on the clay, and the ware is afterwards baked in ovens or furnaces. These persons, therefore, who cause the earth to be dug, collect it for their children or grand-children.

WHAT IS THE PALLIUM?

The English people have become quite versed in the mysteries of ecclesiastical affairs. The pallium, which is given by the Pope to the Archbishop, was originally a Greek dress peculiar to scholars; but was afterwards given to a flowing robe of purple worn by majesty, and it has now become a piece of fine cloth worn in the wardrobe of the Catholic service. The history of its manufacture is as follows: Three times a year, on a white mule, the Pope, Pio, on the road to Tivoli, an old convent of nuns situated to the still more ancient church of St. Agnes. These nuns are very poor, and rarely do any of Rome's high-born damsels enter the cloister of this lonely and neglected sisterhood. The Pope, on his arrival, presents a candle to the monastery, and therein keep a couple of sacred lambs, not necessarily of the same fangled genius, but on the old patriarchal spindle, and weave it in a loom of which the pattern might date from the days of Penelope.

REVENGE.

The noblest revenge we can take upon our enemies is to do them a kindness, for to return evil for evil, and injury for injury, will afford but a temporary gratification to our evil passions, and our enemies will only be rendered the more bitter against us. But, to take the first opportunity of showing them how superior we are to them, by doing them a kindness, or by rendering them a service, the shine of reproach will enter deeply in their soul; and, while unto us it will be a noble retaliation, our triumph will not unfrequently be rendered complete, not only by blotting out the malice that had otherwise stood against us, but by bringing repentant hearts to offer themselves at the shrine of friendship.

TO ——

BY NELLY A. MERRIMON.

"The means were worthy, and the end is won,
I would not die by that sad blow had known."
BYRON.

So the tie is broken that bound this heart
To mine, hushed affie, through joy and sorrow;
You tell me to forget, and coldly part
From this last kneel the cherished dreams of years.
Dreams in which thine image blended
With my soul's wildest thoughts of bliss;
My whole life's aim, serving thee, seemed ended,
And my reward—to this!

I'll not remind thee of the vanished hours,
But once more, and then, a long farewell;
I'll then that round thy heart life's fetters twine
Will cluster sweet—that in thine ear no knell
Will sound, pealing for blighted hopes,
When last life-gleam is o'er!
But when memory with the worn heart opens,
Though lost forevermore.

Farewell, and when on me our child doth turn
His eyes of night, I'll pray that he
May know no guile, and learn
His lisping lips to pray for thee.
His dark hair waves above thy pearly brow;
His starry eyes are his with childish glee.
He's half he hopes yet, and now
Farewell, farewell to thee.
DUNDEE, Mich.

THE PUZZLING PROBLEM;

OR,

OW I WOOT MY HEARTIE.

BY MARY W. STANLEY GIBSON.

CHAPTER I.

But scarlet lasts when ye come to court me
And roses on return the look gude to give—
Syne up the back skaits and hot mahotty ere,
And comes ay ye were a-courtin' to do.
At Kirk or at market whene'er ye meet me
Gang not as though ye cared nae a flee;
But stand me a blink o' your bonnie black e'e,
Yet look not as ye were na lookin' at me.
BURNS.

My mother had a merry party gathered together at her country house in the summer of 18—. All they were all ill—much occupied with their own affairs to mind a romping little school girl like me, and although I spent a great part of my time in the parlors, no one ever seemed to think I had outgrown petting and might safely be treated as a reasonable human being.

I did not complain of this, because it left me free to watch all my guests more closely. The old proverb "Little pitchers have long ears," never seemed to be remembered in my case, and I listened and looked till my head and my heart was well known to me—child as I was.

That my pretty mother was going to marry the good old Grey, who had been an old beau, and gave me bon bons;—that Miss Annibel White was making a "dead set" at young John Eastman, and with every appearance of success;—that Colonel Lawson was trying to find favor to the eyes of Clara Steel;—all these things I understood, and went about it all opposed to. But that Judge Hamilton should love and marry Miss Celia Bradford, didn't suit me at all—and it was upon this pair of prospective bride down that my gray eyes were most frequently turned.

No doubt it was a great piece of presumption in me, to have my thoughts at all about the matter. But Miss Celia was young and beautiful and dashing, and a great belle, and Judge Hamilton was a man of thirty, handsome, wealthy and distinguished, and evidently made sport of choosing in all things for himself. But I could not help the feeling. It came over me every time I saw them together. I knew she was not good enough for him—I had heard her mother congratulating her on her good luck in marrying him, and knew if she married him at last, it would be only because of his wealth, and not for love of him.

I was in a corner window of the deserted parlor one pleasant summer afternoon, perplexing myself over a hard problem in Davies', which was to be solved for the next morning's lesson, when a shower of rose leaves came through the casement and fell upon the open page of my book. I looked up—and there stood the Judge—his hand full of buds and blossoms, ready to repeat his unsuccessful salute.

"Don't bother your head with Algebra, Miss Gay," he said, with a merry laugh. "Its too pleasant a day. Come out and take a walk with me—we are going out in the woods."

"Oh, but I can't." I answered dolefully. "I cannot solve this tiresome thing, and mamma told me not to leave the house till I had finished it. It's too bad! I wish all the Algebras in the country were burned."

"Shall we have a private bonfire on our own account?" and putting his hand on the window sill he sprang lightly in and took a chair beside me.

"Now tell me all your troubles, Gay, and I'll say and help you out of them," he said, good naturedly.

"But the walking party! What will mamma say?" I stammered somewhat ashamed at the thought of depriving Miss Celia of her cavalier.

He only laughed as he answered—

"They never will miss me—and as for your mama I will make my peace with her, and yours too."

They did miss him—and we heard his name from different parts of the grounds, not three minutes after. He would not answer the summons—he made a feint of hiding himself behind my chair, and pronounced it excellent fun. I lost all my girlish fear of him when I found him so playful and good natured, and should have been very sorry if they could have noticed him from me.

When they ceased calling and went down the avenue, he came out of his concealment and took his place once more by my side.

"Now, Miss Gay, he said, we will not if we have so good success with this knotty Algebra Down your chair a little closer—there. And now give me your whole attention, and in a little while I fancy the whole thing will be set right."

He was not mistaken. It was much easier listening to his explanations in that cool and pleasant parlor than to understand my cross teacher in a heated school room. He did not do my work for me—but explained away the difficulties, and left me to go on with the task. I worked lustily, for he still sat near me, intent upon a review—and in little more than half an hour, I looked up gladly, and laid my slate aside.

"Done so soon?" he asked.

I pointed to the slate. He gave a hasty glance at the result, and his kind smile rewarded me for all my trouble.

"And now," he said, bringing my gipsy hat from the hall, "as I have given up my walk on your account, its no more than fair for you to take me on another."

He tied on my hat as if I had been a little girl, and we answered off on a rose hunting expedition. Down in the garden, close by the brook's edge, we found such rare specimens, that Judge made wreaths of my favorite flowers and bound them in my curls, and even helped me make and nail little boxes of leaves with a contrivance, as if he too had been sixteen, and a boyish school girl. What would Miss Celia have thought, if she could have seen the gentleman who was always so dignified and stately with her, clapping his hands and laughing like a boy, when one of the little nails in my box got jammed between rocks and stones, and went floating down the stream.

The happy afternoon were quickly away, and the voices of the returning party first started us from our childish amusements. The Judge laughed and then colored to the roots of his hair—I, with a wholesome dread of Miss Celia and my lady mother before my eyes, summoned a hasty excuse, and fled to the house like a scared deer.

I reached the parlor safely, and settled down in my accustomed nook with Tennyson in my hand. By and by I saw the party approaching, and among them sauntered the Judge by the side of Miss Celia, who had forgiven his desertion. He carried her bouquet and fan and looked stately as a king. But her eye quickly fell upon me, and as they entered the room, I should have believed I had been committing sacrilege, by the cool manner—Miss Celia was at rest—and my mother complimented me on my sudden fit of industry. The Judge looked very handsome, but I here my "blushing honors" very modestly, and all was well.

CHAPTER II.

My heart is safe—I dare to love it still
My heart is safe for somebody!
I could make a winter night
For the sake of somebody!
Ye powers that smile so virtuous love,
O, sweetly smile on somebody!
Frn the danger keep him free,
And send the lady safe to somebody!
Oh! how for somebody!
Oh! how for somebody!
I could range the world around,
For the sake of somebody!
BURNS.

From that time he often passed now and then to give a kind word or smile, when Miss Celia was deep in the mysteries of the toilet, or discussing the fashions with my mother. I had no thoughts yet of coming out; my dresses were always of plain and delicate muslins, made in the simplest way, and I wore gipsy hats and long curls, like a little girl. My mother was not too much occupied with her finance to see that I was growing tall and womanly. Miss Celia was a "mamma little mother" to me, and I was in her way, and rarely spoke to me if I kept out of it, and the judge played "graces," and bachelors and shabbiness, for the last and last time, without raising a frown upon that lady's polished brow. She thought me nothing more than a child, and never dreamed of suspecting if any one had hinted that I might, in time, become a dangerous rival.

But in those fair summer months, I stepped from girlhood to womanhood. My school tasks grew irksome to me, and I thought what a wonderful kind of dress I should long to see in the shape of a muslin. The thicker the bonbons, the more certainly I brought them home, and I watched him with jealous eyes. Every word he spoke to Miss Celia, every glance he gave at her beautiful face, stung me to the heart in a sudden pain. I turned cold if he approached her; I burned with rage and grief if he lifted the small, white hand to his lips. I could die for a moment in his, as he led her to a seat.

It was folly, insanity. I knew it to be so, and by and by, when I taught myself to do it, that she was the lady of his love, while I was only the plaything of an hour, my heart took pride came to my aid, and I did my best to forget him.

A word of my mother's future husband came to pay a visit to my mother, before our summer party was broken up. He was a gay, dashing college student, as full of fun and merriment as I, and made love to me in a boyish, nonsensical way, that made me laugh while it interested me. Frank Grey was not my beau ideal by any means, but I liked him, and he did me good. I was no longer lonely and melancholy; he gave me no time for that. We rode and walked together; he taught me to leap my black horse over high fences, and raised my neck in one way or another a dozen times in no many hours as he learned me to fish, and actually made me fire off his rifle one afternoon, a feat which I accomplished with shut eyes and trembling hands, and a feeling as if I was about to be blown into atoms; "in short," as Mr. Micawber would say, we were the merriest, happiest friends alive. My mother laughed, and said she had two great boys instead of one; the good Doctor looked at us curiously and attentively from under his heavy eyebrows, as if we were natural phenomenons to be carefully studied. Miss Celia drew back in dainty dismay, when we raced through the house, or galloped down the road; and Judge Hamilton rarely came near me. I would not fret about it. I set my teeth resolutely, and went on in a wilder way than ever.

I have said that Frank made love to me. It was by fits and starts, but only because he had a periodical recurrence of the disease. Sometimes for a week the thing would never have entered my head, and he would slap me on the shoulder, and call me "a prime good fellow," as if I had been a boy, and then within twelve hours was sighing to me with a story that always made me laugh.

On one of these occasions we were upon the old piazza together. He heaved a prodigious sigh.

"What is the matter, Frank?" I asked, demurely.

"Have you his leave to speak?"

"Bother the bothaten!" he answered savagely. "You know well enough why I sigh. You have had enough when a fellow loves you to distraction—to distraction I say," and then he broke down with a piteous look that sent me into a hearty fit of laughter. He rose and set all shaking by this, and laid my hand, went on—

"Now, Gay, do be reasonable, and say you will marry me when I get through college."

"But just think, Frank," was my mischievous reply. "what a sadly mixed affair it would be—really horrible. I couldn't think of the thing a moment."

"Then I suppose Gay Hamilton would can be?" he said sarcastically, and then seeing me spring to my feet with a vivid flush on my cheek and forehead, he broke out in boyish wrath: "I thought you had. Confound him! I'll punch his head for him," and leaping from the piazza, ran like a deer around the house.

I could not laugh now as his ludicrous speech. The sharp pain and estrangement had given joy, and for the moment I revelled in the innocent happiness of those days when the queerest eyes of Arthur Hamilton had not upon me with an indifference that I heard my head against the pillar of the piazza, and dodged my curls under my clasped hands, and down the bitter pain there. I did not weep—and my lady mother found me in this position on a hasty excuse, and fled to the house like a scared deer.

I reached the parlor safely, and settled down in my accustomed nook with Tennyson in my hand. By and by I saw the party approaching, and among them sauntered the Judge by the side of Miss Celia, who had forgiven his desertion. He carried her bouquet and fan and looked stately as a king. But her eye quickly fell upon me, and as they entered the room, I should have believed I had been committing sacrilege, by the cool manner—Miss Celia was at rest—and my mother complimented me on my sudden fit of industry. The Judge looked very handsome, but I here my "blushing honors" very modestly, and all was well.

CHAPTER II.

My heart is safe—I dare to love it still
My heart is safe for somebody!
I could make a winter night
For the sake of somebody!
Ye powers that smile so virtuous love,
O, sweetly smile on somebody!
Frn the danger keep him free,
And send the lady safe to somebody!
Oh! how for somebody!
Oh! how for somebody!
I could range the world around,
For the sake of somebody!
BURNS.

From that time he often paused now and then to give a kind word or smile, when Miss Celia was deep in the mysteries of the toilet, or discussing the fashions with my mother. I had no thoughts yet of coming out; my dresses were always of plain and delicate muslins, made in the simplest way, and I wore gipsy hats and long curls, like a little girl. My mother was not too much occupied with her finance to see that I was growing tall and womanly. Miss Celia was a "mamma little mother" to me, and I was in her way, and rarely spoke to me if I kept out of it, and the judge played "graces," and bachelors and shabbiness, for the last and last time, without raising a frown upon that lady's polished brow. She thought me nothing more than a child, and never dreamed of suspecting if any one had hinted that I might, in time, become a dangerous rival.

But in those fair summer months, I stepped from girlhood to womanhood. My school tasks grew irksome to me, and I thought what a beautiful kind of dress I should long to see in the shape of a muslin. The thicker the bonbons, the more certainly I brought them home, and I watched him with jealous eyes. Every word he spoke to Miss Celia, every glance he gave at her beautiful face, stung me to the heart in a sudden pain. I turned cold if he approached her; I burned with rage and grief if he lifted the small, white hand to his lips. I could die for a moment in his, as he led her to a seat.

It was folly, insanity. I knew it to be so, and by and by, when I taught myself to do it, that she was the lady of his love, while I was only the plaything of an hour, my heart took pride came to my aid, and I did my best to forget him.

A word of my mother's future husband came to pay a visit to my mother, before our summer party was broken up. He was a gay, dashing college student, as full of fun and merriment as I, and made love to me in a boyish, nonsensical way, that made me laugh while it interested me. Frank Grey was not my beau ideal by any means, but I liked him, and he did me good. I was no longer lonely and melancholy; he gave me no time for that. We rode and walked together; he taught me to leap my black horse over high fences, and raised my neck in one way or another a dozen times in no many hours as he learned me to fish, and actually made me fire off his rifle one afternoon, a feat which I accomplished with shut eyes and trembling hands, and a feeling as if I was about to be blown into atoms; "in short," as Mr. Micawber would say, we were the merriest, happiest friends alive. My mother laughed, and said she had two great boys instead of one; the good Doctor looked at us curiously and attentively from under his heavy eyebrows, as if we were natural phenomenons to be carefully studied.

DOWN TO ZERO.

BY NATHALIE CARL.

Well—upon my word, I don't see why Barnum and all those other worthies want to rove round the world for curiosities when creatures so odd, strange are close at their elbow every moment in the day! Talk about Joice Heth and the woolly horse! They are not a begining to that bundle of contradictions yclept "a man."

There's Mr. Carl now! A whole regiment of novelists never could have manufactured so warm a lover. He "piled up the agony" so high that he has never been able to reach it since! In those days I was a scrap—a chrysalis—an angel! No spun gold could equal my curls, no lily was ever half so blue as my eyes—no more one eighth as white as my little hands! Now what I want to know, is this: Was Mr. Carl man drunk, or a fool, or only lying? Because now I don't think he knows whether his hair is black or white, and so long as the eyes are that his shirt bosoms are never buttonless, and the little hands grow stiff and tired in turning his sandpaper, he is perfectly satisfied, and compliments are quite a drug in the market.

I suppose he admires my dresses and go into ecstacies over a rosebud in my hair. Now I might be making this time of writing a confession, for that is was concerned. The most elegant morning gown that ever encircled all of little silk sprees, and most killing gremlin slippers have no more effect on him than so much brown sugar. I am afraid that I did get provoked at his insensibility and come to a regular spat in the most horrid of silk wrappers (it had once belonged to my chumbermaid) and with my hair in a complete mass! Then what did he do? The man never knew that I was dressed any differently from my usual way!

Why, he just used to sit for hours and look into my face, "studying its lights and shades and expressions," or some such nonsense. Now he looks at me as abstractedly as if I was a stone wall, and goes moping around with his hands in his pockets, beaming to himself and looking over me and beyond me and everything except at me. All I've had from all his conversations, I can remember, too, when he would have a cut at me, and I'd get terribly mad, and now, if by any chance we are together of an evening, we never say anything, but pass and lay down on the sofa and sleep and smirk and groan and clutches all the bed clothes, and I'm afraid that such work must soon make of sleeping. If I couldn't do the business better I'd keep awake till I was gray! Why I'm sure I'm not now that never can be! Just look at my front locks—alone!

Oh, but I can't, Mr. Carl does. He looks glum when I go out shopping and come home with my pocket-book as flat as a pancake, and don't help it! If merchants will have such handsome clerks, Mr. Carl must take the consequences!) and he looks glum still if I don't scan to care. If I go to the park, and have a gentleman accompany me, and I get me a lecture as long as my arm—if I speak to any and leave I might as well mount the scaffold at once—even though Mr. Carl is at the very moment playing the fiend to Mrs. Bell Hume with the most scandalous flirt that ever existed. I must sit still and say nothing but I can't expect him to be with me all the time, for that is his peculiar privilege and protection which would be dangerous for me as a woman—do—don't! Oh yes! What stuff!

I wonder if Tom Chester would have served me so! I am sure he would have asked me when I sang "My Cottage Home," and sneered when I played the "Battle of Prague!" I wonder if he would have handled a his coaching days the beautiful stanza:

"Here's a health to one I le dare,
Here's a health to one I le dare—"

and sent a sneer at the smile when found lovers meet.

And soft as their parting tear—Jessy!"

and then, in his married ones written under it—"Soft as their parting tears now!" Truth and poetry combined! That's what Mr. Carl did! The wretch! "Soft as their parting tears now—Jessy!"

Poor Tom! How handsome he was and how listless and unhappy he looks now! I never used to see him without feeling the glance in his eyes and the smile on his lips that made me feel as if I had rendered for love instead of money, Tom and I——

Pshaw! What am I talking about? I haven't a doubt but that six months you would have been the far-simile of Mr. Carl! I know an old aunt term proverb:

"It spoils a man to marry him
And spoils a woman to be an old maid."

This matrimony is the greatest cure for romance I ever knew of! The thermometer is always "down to Zero" after the honeymoon has passed.

Some years ago Mr. Carl wrote: "Are you ready to marry?" or give me a "fond embrace?" My dear, he has lighted his cigar put his feet upon the mantelpiece and with his head on the back of the chair is reading the paper That's my greeting! Love-like—isn't it?

SOCIAL COMFORT.

If "Good Society," says one who knows more than is not, but might well have been appended to the definition—"is the art of showing others, by external signs, the kindness which we have for them. It arises from good sense, improved by conversing with good company." It is not uncommon for men and women to suppose, when you speak of "well bred people," that you mean a clan, or a class, who have polite forms and fashions. There never was a sillier mistake. The best people are those who have the kindest hearts, who is ship-yard, and commanded his fortune with a broadaxe. His manners were what you usually find with the manners of a navy. Good nature he treated every man with a delicacy and gentleness from which any courtier might take a lesson. He had a regard for everybody's comfort; and a belief that man, hard handed or soft, was something made in the image of God, was the ruling principle of his conduct. Good breeding is the first element of social comfort.

"Vulgarity is sin," and vulgarity, the vulgarity of court or level, is the same thing: it is an essential meanness and baseness of character, betraying itself in a want of consideration for the feelings and happiness of others. But one of the greatest arts in good breeding is knowing how to let people alone. It is just that part of it which makes social comfort. Allow people to be happy their own way, and half the time they imagine they have derived their happiness from their host's or hostess's skill in entertaining them, which is true, but not in the same sense they take it. Insist upon providing amusement for everybody your way, and you can frame a hundred people into icicles in an hour.

A SKETCH.

A maiden wandered by the side of a quiet stream, her brow was smooth and fair, no wrinkle told of growing care, and gnawing sorrow. Life was to her a summer's day. And as she wandered, she murmured aloud beautifully, "Oh that the fairy folk were yet in the world, that I might ask of them a boon, sorely I should not be denied." Then sweet music floated on the wings of zephyrs, and a low, soft, silvery voice replied: "Lady, the fairies still are here, they have not yet all departed. Then art young, fair and good, name thy boon, it shall not be denied then." "Kind fairy, the gift I would ask of thee, is a long life. Grant that I may stay long in this beautiful world, where the birds sing, and the leaves whisper, and the waters dance. Oh, fairy, hear my prayer." The voice of the invisible fairy was more mournful than before as she replied: "Maiden, hast then well considered that which thou demandest?" The maiden said, "I have." Then was the fairy silent. "If I had ever so then declined. But stay a moment, lady; shoulder clear at any time repent thee of the gratification of this desire, and recall me, for the fairy of the stream; I am still thy friend."

Years passed on, and once more I saw the maiden; this time she was not alone there was one by her side who poured into her ear those words so sweet to the lover's dream, the words of love. Time had only matured her charms, and intercourse with society had given to a singular polish to her manners. She was now a lovely, fascinating woman. I saw her again as she stood by the altar, with at her side her life long helper to whom she gave her young heart's best affection. Oh, then she was beautiful. The light that streamed in through the painted glass fell in rich colors all around, and there in that holy place she stood and took upon herself vows—oh how solemn.

No sunlight smiled on her path unclouded, no radiance expressed her soul, all was gladness, hope! She was all this and more brightly shining. Friends flocked around her, gathered and gladdened in her warm hair, wealth gratified her every desire—she seemed supremely blest. At the crowded assembly, at the midnight ball, she was acknowledged queen of grace and beauty. Was she happy? I had forgotten!

But once again did I see the lady, and then, oh how changed! Deep lines were graven by sorrow's hand, on the once fair brow so smooth and fair. No husband now beat looks of admiration upon her; she was solitary and alone, her beauty was faded and gone. What was a fairy flow! No, for worse, she was that most miserable of creatures, a lonely, old, decrepit, neglected wife. No traces were left of the beauty once so striking, the hand of disease had swept them all away, and with them those precious qualities of the mind which enable the possessor to obtain an enduring hold of the affections of others, the heart of her husband had formerly lost to her. He sighed for a kindred spirit in the companion he had chosen, but he found it not. The heartless world which had dazzled him in former years was gone, and nothing remained to compensate for its loss. Poor neglected wife! truly thy lot was a sad one, living with all the bitterness of which woman's heart is capable, thy husband's love was torn thyself despised. Where now are thy curly dreams of happiness? Alas! they have all vanished, and nought is left but the sad, cold realities of life. Once more I saw her advanced, but sleep visited not her eyelids; no, even this temporary forgetfulness of her misery and sorrows was denied her. Restless and weary, she longed with earnest longings for the morning light. Suddenly a thought struck her, and softly rising she stood upright, and wands round her wasted form and took her way, guided by the struggling moonbeams, to the room, where in happier days she had sat the fairy of the stream. With a trembling voice she cried, "Fairy, I summon thee, come to my side." Then the fairy's voice was heard once more, as it said in tones of deep compassion, "Daughter of earth, I know that which thou wouldst of me, be it even as thou hast said." Tomorrow thou shalt be released from all thy sufferings." "Thanks to thee, generous fairy," said the broken-hearted one, and she took her way silently to her solitary home. I saw the lady no more, but I know where she calmly reposes, under a willow which weeps o'er her tomb, in the little village churchyard.

"After life's fitful fever, she sleeps well."

HAPPY KILLEN.

Kitty and Ellen were sisters of nearly the same age, and always dressed alike. One day when they expected company, an older sister put some new ribbons on Kitty's cap, and told her to wear, and so she saw Ellen's eye resting upon it, she said to her: "I put that bow on Kitty's cap purposely, for I had none for yours; but I will take it off, that you may be dressed alike."

Kitty looked disappointed, but before she had time to speak, Ellen said, smiling, "O no, sister; I had rather Kitty would wear the bow; it is very pretty, and now I can see it on her neck, but I could not see it if it were on mine."

It is very unimportant what little girls wear, if their clothing is neat, but it is important that they should be amiable and disinterested; and all will find that the way to be happy is to be unselfish, and look on the bright side of everything, as dear little Ellen always does.

METTA.

THE WORLD MOVES.

The finger of Galileo is shown under a glass case in the Florence Museum. It stands on a mysterious looking bit of parchment, pointing towards heaven. The hand to which it belonged is supposed to have been put to the torture by the Inquisition for ascribing motion to the earth, and the finger is now worshiped for having proved the motion.

THE NEW YORK LEDGER

NEW YORK LEDGER

ROBERT BONNER, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 26.

TERMS OF THE LEDGER.—Two Dollars per annum; two copies, for Three Dollars; payable invariably in advance. No subscription taken for a less period than one year.

A SLANDER REFUTED.

Lovers of the Fine Arts in the United States, painters, sculptors, designers and others of that ilk; are disposed to lament the slow growth of a love of the beautiful among our citizens. "The taste of the people," say they, is uncultivated or depraved;—articles are not encouraged; Painting, Sculpture, Architecture are not so widely admired or so highly esteemed in this country as in Europe:—American art is a "dwarf in trailing strings." &c.

The United States, it must be admitted, does not possess specimens or collections of Painting and Statuary rivalling those of Italy, France or England. We cannot point to a National Gallery of Paintings like the Louvre at Paris, or to Cathedrals and public buildings as splendid as those which adorn the capitals of Europe. And we have reason to boast that such is the fact. The laboring and poorer classes in this country have not been oppressed and plundered that their rulers might be enriched, that the private dwellings of tyrants might be adorned with the beautiful productions of art, that the taste and pride of the ostentatious might be gratified, that our fashionable churches might be enlarged to the magnificent proportions of a Notre Dame in Paris, a St. Paul's in London or a St. Peter's in Rome.

The position of Art among us should not be estimated by our exhibitions of Paintings, by our churches and public buildings. These are but the signs, the outward manifestations of a love of the beautiful among the people —a love already widely displayed in the numerous, simple ornaments which are used to add to the comforts and enjoyments of home. The decorations of our churches, hotels, theatres, stores, public buildings, which are used in general, good; and we can commend them as worthy of examination and study. Their beauty is always open to public inspection, and a constant source of public enjoyment. Of our progress in this direction, however, we have, at present, no reason to boast. Our triumphs have been gained on another field, and we can point with pride to the neat, comfortable, happy homes of our citizens. No nation can claim any higher honor than to say that in proportion to her size and population, she contains the largest number of beautiful homesteads and intelligent, contented, smiling citizens. This honor is justly claimed by the United States.

It is the peculiar glory of this country that the productions of Art, however few and plain, are made accessible to all,—are brought, as it were, to the hearth of every citizen, and, thus, all are, in some measure, educated and qualified to appreciate and enjoy the beauty of a specimen of architecture, of a piece of sculpture, or of a painting. Specimens of Art are better judges of architecture, and know more about its different styles, and the adaptation of each style to a particular object than any other people. It is generally admitted that our stores, ware houses, churches, public buildings, hotels, cars, packet ships, ocean and river steamers are better adapted to the end for which they were designed than those of Europe. We have still much to learn, yet we have "gone ahead" and are ahead. Our citizens will and do support Art, when it administers to their enjoyment. They love the Beautiful and they are willing to pay for it. The immense circulation of illustrated literature such as Harper's Magazine, the unparalelled success of the Ledger, are examples, from many that might be mentioned, of the very liberal patronage which the American people are ready to extend to the Fine Arts.

DOWN WITH THE DUST.

The dust of our streets is becoming an intolerable nuisance. On a windy day it is perfectly awful; it penetrates the recesses of our ears and our wardrobes, dances along the tenderest nerves of the eye, and colonizes the nostrils. It besmears our pockets, too; for dust corrodes the fibre of cloth as well as aggravates the nerves of humanity, and garments which have to be frequently and constantly brushed are presently tenderly doomed to the old-clothes man. Beside, when a lady returns from a walk down Broadway, she looks as though she had been rolled in an ash-barrel, and has some ground for declaring that "that bonnet is no longer fit to be seen" which any married man knows is synonymous with a notification that a new one is wanted.

Mayor Wood has exhibited great capacity for "kicking up a dust;" has he not the ability to down with it?

A Beautiful Poem, by Mrs. Emily P. Lenderaier, will be found in another column. It will be difficult for any one to read it without being pleased with it. Mrs. L. is a woman of remarkable ability and we venture to predict, that if one of these days be the owner of a large reputation.

☞ Among the number of our complete original stories, this week, will be found two by Mr. Cobb. They are good, as is everything that emanates from his pen.

A "FREE LOVER" ANSWERED.

New York, April 17, 1856.

Mr. Ledger:—Sir—Do you think it inconsistent upon a man to deny himself the gratification of congenial company, of foreign travel, and the cultivation of his intellectual nature, for fear his children may not receive that attention and education which a doting mother covets for them? Or, to put the question in round terms, if he considers that I am inclined to the "free-love" and "individuality" doctrines, I must in time be a slave to his family all his life? And if it is his duty to sacrifice himself to his children, how is he to get any comfort out of it? Ignoramus.

A REMARK.

It will probably be difficult for those who have never encountered specimens of the more selfish of their species to believe that a man could act with such heartless as the above, in cool blood; but we know persons who practice the philosophy which our correspondent's inquiries point at, without so much as troubling their consciences to ask any questions upon the subject. The doctrines of those who advocate "freelove" and the "sovereignty of the individual" are much more extensively practised than preached. There are men in this city who habitually and remorselessly leave their families to poverty and destitution as they best can, while they who should protect and support them, are spending their time in idleness and vice, or in wasting congenial circles.

To reply more specifically to our correspondent: When a man marries, he enters into a most solemn covenant with society, with his wife, and with his children. Chiefly in consequence of the duties appertaining to the domestic relation, and he has no right afterwards to shrink from any of its obligations, whether they be of difficulties and misunderstandings they may subject him. No real manly man would ever think of shrinking from such obligations, or of making your selfish scouts who adopt the doctrines of "free-love" and the "sovereignty of the individual;" men who, under whatever circumstances, would (if they had the courage) blossom from the countenance to footpads and whalers—the most despicable and inhuman. The idea that a man—a husband and father—should wish to be relieved from the responsibility of more than his family enjoys, seems so contemptible that we are at a loss to characterize it. If a child that steals into a family is entitled—though such are strokes of unmitigated surly stress; over billocks, originally—now coupled over and over, and down with decayed cabbages, onions, potatoes, coffee and tea grounds, in which children can thrive, and many vanity reading; not reading groceries and their blear-eyed keepers; past crowded tenement houses; through combinues and cellars, through—avenue and Irish women to the dock, where hundreds are already congregated; some on foot, some in carriages, some on horseback, perched on hearse, perched on fences; strung like beads on strings, and floating in egg-shell boats in the river. Little boy wanting to get out—their toes are touched on; ladies pouting at their broken hoops; limbs, worm, with mud inevitable appliances for mattresses, costly nursing their "babies;" Dr. Spolaski—M. D. A. B. C. D. G. H. K. L. M. N. O. &c. &c. of World Wide or European fame," striking an attitude and his horse for doing just what he slyly touched up with his long to make him do! Authors, and lawyers, reporters, clergymen, dandies, clerks, coquettes and sailors, all waiting for—the ferry boat.

Mr. Pax. "Well, Mary, I see no way for us to get a good view but to go aboard that steamer yonder, and—" [Looks at World Wide or European fame," striking an attitude and his horse for doing just what he slyly touched up with his long to make him do! Authors, and lawyers, reporters, clergymen, dandies, clerks, coquettes and sailors, all waiting for—the ferry boat.

Mr. Pax. "Well, Mary, I see no way for us to get a good view but to go aboard that steamer yonder, and—" [Looks at World Wide's chart.] "Public wharf? what's that?"

Mrs. Pax. "Never mind dictionary now, Pax; you'll spoil your dinner. I've occupied in a second, if you don't hurry. Come?"

Mrs. Pax very gingerly treads the slight plank on the side of the steamer, and shrinks at Mr. Pax's diplomatic remarks to the pilot, who is a most nervous and unbelieving manner, till she gains the deck; and what a sense of relief at the sight of a seat she is expected to perform, exclaiming reproachfully, "Pax, I declare, never mind, with such a pair of gaiter boots."

Under the influence of this dexterous and delicate compliment Mr. Pax sits down, Mrs. Pax clutching and climbing—and so the "publicwharf" was gained at last; and a good-natured fellow passenger gave him a new blue Pax a biped more pretentious, and less civil, wonders, as he moves the sixteenth part of an inch, "what the devil occupies folks want to go a Launch for?"

Mrs. Pax smiles "hush!" and then waves his hand triumphantly at the scene before him. Sure enough, what an inspiriting sight! what a glorious panorama! And then, how like to the bow bright the sparkling waters! how eager the countless thousands who gaze spell-bound on this noble, grand, and thrilling scene. Their lives will be constantly chequered with hasty and ill-advised acts and unavailing regrets for their commission! Let us, therefore, have no "hasty marriages."

BAD "AIR."

New York, April 17, 1856.

Mr. Ledger:—My wife permits the women to take our little daughter, aged four years, out with her, when she goes on visits to her acquaintances, and also often sends the child out with me to get the air." But I have heard of her taking my daughter into places where any "air" she might get was so infected with the odor of rum and other vile things, that the more she got of it, the worse off she would be. Do you think it is judicious thus to entrust children with servants? Truly yours,

A. B. C.

We think it is very injudicious thus to entrust children with servants. Only a parent's eye can properly watch them, and only a parent's care can protect them against accidents and contamination.

FRESH FERN LEAVES.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1855, by T. S. Arthur, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

LAUNCH OF THE ADRIATIC.

Mr. Pax. (Looking up from the morning paper.) "Mary, wont you go with me to see the launch this morning?"

Mrs. Pax. (Exercising herself comfortably in an easy chair.) "Me? I don't know a row-boat from a steamship; besides, my breakfast has not had time to digest, the children must be packed off with their grammars and lunches to school, and—there you see," said Mrs. Pax, with a long drawn breath of relief, "that it's quite impossible, for here comes a proof to be read for the Weekly Messenger."

Mr. Pax. "Pshaw! you know very well that you can run that over in ten minutes; the launch comes off at ten; it is not far to the dock; I will get your bonnet."

Men always think a woman has nothing to do in case of a spontaneous bid to "put on her bonnet" and go. I am proud to say Mr. Pax does not pronounce bonnet "bunnet," like the rest of his sex; Jones, Smithfield, parasols, (blessed invention!) shawls and mantillas being supposed by some magic to leap forth and dispose themselves in the case of novel invasion, who draggle through uncounted miles of bog, ditch and briar, and come out resplendent in wife, and with the slightest possible addition of napkins, or a relay of robes.

Mrs. Pax corrects her proofs; answering notes, and finishing the little Paxes about stray geographies and gloves, missing authorities and aprons, with occasional parentheses to the baby, who was in a way of mistaking Miss. for "waste paper," and who after all may be considered as the "sovereignty of the individual" par excellence, under circumstances, would (if they had the courage) blossom from countenance to footpads and whalers—the most despicable and inhuman. The idea that a man—a husband and father—should wish to be relieved from the responsibility of more than his family enjoys, seems so contemptible that we are at a loss to characterize it. If a child that steals into a family is entitled—though such are strokes of unmitigated surly stress; over billocks, originally—now coupled over and over, and down with decayed cabbages, onions, potatoes, coffee and tea grounds, in which children can thrive, and many vanity reading; not reading groceries and their blear-eyed keepers; past crowded tenement houses; through combinues and cellars, through—avenue and Irish women to the dock, where hundreds are already congregated; some on foot, some in carriages, some on horseback, perched on hearse, perched on fences; strung like beads on strings, and floating in egg-shell boats in the river. Little boy wanting to get out—their toes are touched on; ladies pouting at their broken hoops; limbs, worm, with mud inevitable appliances for mattresses, costly nursing their "babies;" Dr. Spolaski—M. D. A. B. C. D. G. H. K. L. M. N. O. &c. &c. of World Wide or European fame," striking an attitude and his horse for doing just what he slyly touched up with his long to make him do! Authors, and lawyers, reporters, clergymen, dandies, clerks, coquettes and sailors, all waiting for—the ferry boat.

Mr. Pax. "Well, Mary, I see no way for us to get a good view but to go aboard that steamer yonder, and—" [Looks at World Wide's chart.] "Public wharf? what's that?"

Mrs. Pax. "Never mind dictionary now, Pax; you'll spoil your dinner. I've occupied in a second, if you don't hurry. Come?"

Mrs. Pax very gingerly treads the slight plank on the side of the steamer, and shrinks at Mr. Pax's diplomatic remarks to the pilot, who is a most nervous and unbelieving manner, till she gains the deck; and what a sense of relief at the sight of a seat she is expected to perform, exclaiming reproachfully, "Pax, I declare, never mind, with such a pair of gaiter boots."

Under the influence of this dexterous and delicate compliment Mr. Pax sits down, Mrs. Pax clutching and climbing—and so the "publicwharf" was gained at last; and a good-natured fellow passenger gave him a new blue Pax a biped more pretentious, and less civil, wonders, as he moves the sixteenth part of an inch, "what the devil occupies folks want to go a Launch for?"

Mrs. Pax smiles "hush!" and then waves his hand triumphantly at the scene before him. Sure enough, what an inspiriting sight! what a glorious panorama! And then, how like to the bow bright the sparkling waters! how eager the countless thousands who gaze spell-bound on this noble, grand, and thrilling scene. Their lives will be constantly chequered with hasty and ill-advised acts and unavailing regrets for their commission! Let us, therefore, have no "hasty marriages."

BAD "AIR."

New York, April 17, 1856.

Mr. Ledger:—My wife permits the women to take our little daughter, aged four years, out with her, when she goes on visits to her acquaintances, and also often sends the child out with me to get the air." But I have heard of her taking my daughter into places where any "air" she might get was so infected with the odor of rum and other vile things, that the more she got of it, the worse off she would be. Do you think it is judicious thus to entrust children with servants? Truly yours,

A. B. C.

We think it is very injudicious thus to entrust children with servants. Only a parent's eye can properly watch them, and only a parent's care can protect them against accidents and contamination.

CURRENT ITEMS.

A few mornings since, a family living up town were annoyed by the cries of an infant which seemed to originate on the premises. Search was made, and a handsome boy, about a fortnight old, was neatly dressed, was discovered stowed away in the ash barrel. While they were wondering over the little stranger, a neighbor came in and informed them that his family had found just such another boy in their front area. The two infants were consequently pronounced to be twins, and sent to the foundling hospital.

Within the last seven months, over twenty people have disappeared in New York, Brooklyn and Williamsburgh, who are supposed to have been murdered or else to have committed suicide. Four bodies have only been recovered, since in Williamsburgh, one in a sack and three in barrels, all of which were horribly mutilated.

A few days since, a gentlemanly looking man, about forty years of age, and seemingly in good health, entered a grocery store in Ninth Avenue, and called for a glass of cider, which was given him. He drank it, paying for his lips, and when he had drank half the cider, fell dead upon the floor.

Alexander II of Russia wears the same sword that Napoleon wore at the battle of Wagram in 1809, and which the Emperor Nicholas bought in 1831, just half a century after that event and this day battle, for the enormous sum of thirty-two thousand dollars.

In the county poor-house in Mt. Holly, N. J., a boy was lately put into a cell with a crazy man, as a punishment for some trifling offence. The latter, a wild fit came upon the man, who seized the boy and killed him in a very short time—mangling him in a most shocking manner.

There is said to be a school mistress in a town in the Western part of this State, who not only stands six feet and seven inches in her stockings, and also is the shortest of four children—three sisters and one brother.

It is reported that Russia is preparing to concentrate all her energies upon the building of railroads, canals, manufactories, and other internal developments, a most wise policy for a country to pursue with at last.

As a Mr. Burden, living in Newbern, Alabama, was lying in his bed (having lost yesterday) a gun was thrust through an aperture in a broken pane of glass and fired, and he was killed dead. No cause of the murderer could be discovered.

The French soldiers in the Crimea are said to be anxious for peace and home, while the British go in for more fighting. John Bull's war-furnace just begins to call vastly upon him, while the French are already tired out and disgusted.

It is confidently asserted by European writers that France and England intend to subvert, and that they will subvert, the Turkish Empire, so far as the possessions in Europe are concerned.

Some English letter-writers at Paris, predict a prolonged session of the Peace Congress, and assert that serious difficulties have arisen which may prevent the consummation of a peace.

A carpenter of Cuba has discovered a process for packing wine from the juice of the orange and the pine, also preserved in farro, and kept cool in champagne.

The first pew in a Congregational church in our neighboring city of Brooklyn, was recently sold for two thousand five hundred dollars. The purchaser has used every good accomodation given there!

A French paper says it has been accidentally discovered that in case of epileptic fits a blank cartridge thrown over the sufferers will relieve them immediately.

The temperance in Jerusalem are becoming all the rage in Europe. A large caravan is soon to start for the Holy Land, from Marseilles, France, and another from Trieste, Germany.

The British Government has despatched two war-steamers to cruise in search of the Pacific.

WIT AND HUMOR.

The Chinese bootblacks have an odd way of selling their wares. They carry a pair of boots, according to their value, at a fixed price, but according to weight. If on stepping into the scale to right, the seller coolly tears some leaves from another book, and throws them into the scale! Those who many books published in this country have yet to know enough to be sold by weight. Even the volumes of our light literature might come under the category.

The Montgomerite Rhetoric lady was once found in a paroxysm of tears over her supposed tomb of Pythagoras, at Mount Vesuvius, but subsided so soon as he ate locust!

It is a good thing to laugh, at any rate, says Dryden; and if a straw can tickle a man, it is an instrument of happiness.

"I shall never get out of this scrape alive," as the dog said when they were rubbing the brindle off with a piece of pie.

French thinks that the Thames is called "The Strand" because it is on the principle that 'strand alone always gives a scrape.'

What is the difference between a young girl and an hotel? Merely a difference of time—the last feeling and the other has fell.

A New Fashion and a Good One!—It has become a common practice among New Yorkers to subscribe for their favorite weekly or monthly, as a nice present, to subscribe to and send them the New York Ledger for a year. This is a habit which cannot become too general. It makes more affectionate and ever welcome gift than a year's subscription to such a paper—unless it be a two year's one? And as the subscribers every week hangs with delight over the Ledger's elegant pages, what grateful emotions will arise toward the giver. What gentleman would not think it a bargain for two dollars to be thus remembered and blessed fifty-two times a year by some safey being whose image is daguerreotyped upon his memory.

CURRENT ITEMS.

A few mornings since, a family living up town were annoyed by the cries of an infant which seemed to originate on the premises. Search was made, and a handsome boy, about a fortnight old, was neatly dressed, was discovered stowed away in the ash barrel. While they were wondering over the little stranger, a neighbor came in and informed them that his family had found just such another boy in their front area. The two infants were consequently pronounced to be twins, and sent to the foundling hospital.

Within the last seven months, over twenty people have disappeared in New York, Brooklyn and Williamsburgh, who are supposed to have been murdered or else to have committed suicide. Four bodies have only been recovered, since in Williamsburgh, one in a sack and three in barrels, all of which were horribly mutilated.

A few days since, a gentlemanly looking man, about forty years of age, and seemingly in good health, entered a grocery store in Ninth Avenue, and called for a glass of cider, which was given him. He drank it, paying for his lips, and when he had drank half the cider, fell dead upon the floor.

Alexander II of Russia wears the same sword that Napoleon wore at the battle of Wagram in 1809, and which the Emperor Nicholas bought in 1831, just half a century after that event and this day battle, for the enormous sum of thirty-two thousand dollars.

In the county poor-house in Mt. Holly, N. J., a boy was lately put into a cell with a crazy man, as a punishment for some trifling offence. The latter, a wild fit came upon the man, who seized the boy and killed him in a very short time—mangling him in a most shocking manner.

There is said to be a school mistress in a town in the Western part of this State, who not only stands six feet and seven inches in her stockings, and also is the shortest of four children—three sisters and one brother.

It is reported that Russia is preparing to concentrate all her energies upon the building of railroads, canals, manufactories, and other internal developments, a most wise policy for a country to pursue with at last.

As a Mr. Burden, living in Newbern, Alabama, was lying in his bed (having lost yesterday) a gun was thrust through an aperture in a broken pane of glass and fired, and he was killed dead. No cause of the murderer could be discovered.

The French soldiers in the Crimea are said to be anxious for peace and home, while the British go in for more fighting. John Bull's war-furnace just begins to call vastly upon him, while the French are already tired out and disgusted.

It is confidently asserted by European writers that France and England intend to subvert, and that they will subvert, the Turkish Empire, so far as the possessions in Europe are concerned.

Some English letter-writers at Paris, predict a prolonged session of the Peace Congress, and assert that serious difficulties have arisen which may prevent the consummation of a peace.

A carpenter of Cuba has discovered a process for packing wine from the juice of the orange and the pine, also preserved in farro, and kept cool in champagne.

The first pew in a Congregational church in our neighboring city of Brooklyn, was recently sold for two thousand five hundred dollars. The purchaser has used every good accomodation given there!

A French paper says it has been accidentally discovered that in case of epileptic fits a blank cartridge thrown over the sufferers will relieve them immediately.

The temperance in Jerusalem are becoming all the rage in Europe. A large caravan is soon to start for the Holy Land, from Marseilles, France, and another from Trieste, Germany.

The British Government has despatched two war-steamers to cruise in search of the Pacific.

WIT AND HUMOR.

The Chinese bootblacks have an odd way of selling their wares. They carry a pair of boots, according to their value, at a fixed price, but according to weight. If on stepping into the scale to right, the seller coolly tears some leaves from another book, and throws them into the scale! Those who many books published in this country have yet to know enough to be sold by weight. Even the volumes of our light literature might come under the category.

The Montgomerite Rhetoric lady was once found in a paroxysm of tears over her supposed tomb of Pythagoras, at Mount Vesuvius, but subsided so soon as he ate locust!

It is a good thing to laugh, at any rate, says Dryden; and if a straw can tickle a man, it is an instrument of happiness.

"I shall never get out of this scrape alive," as the dog said when they were rubbing the brindle off with a piece of pie.

French thinks that the Thames is called "The Strand" because it is on the principle that 'strand alone always gives a scrape.'

What is the difference between a young girl and an hotel? Merely a difference of time—the last feeling and the other has fell.

A New Fashion and a Good One!—It has become a common practice among New Yorkers to subscribe for their favorite weekly or monthly, as a nice present, to subscribe to and send them the New York Ledger for a year. This is a habit which cannot become too general. It makes more affectionate and ever welcome gift than a year's subscription to such a paper—unless it be a two year's one? And as the subscribers every week hangs with delight over the Ledger's elegant pages, what grateful emotions will arise toward the giver. What gentleman would not think it a bargain for two dollars to be thus remembered and blessed fifty-two times a year by some safey being whose image is daguerreotyped upon his memory.

MARIE.

BY LOUIS S. BUSHEE.

Sad and alone I sat last night,
Weaving of webs from fancy's woof,
Thinking of thee with a sad delight,
And of joys that sit from my heart aloof—
The fragrant breeze that softly came,
Seemed in passing to breathe thy name.

Long I sat in the evening gloom,
While sides somewhere through memory swept,
Till, under the broad and star-lit dome,
Wearied I sank to the earth and slept—
Slept, and the visions that filled my brain,
Carried me back to my youth again.

Then came thee back from the spirit-land—
O, happy was I as I could be,
Once more I clasped in mine own thy hand,
And spoke of my burning love for thee;
I gazed and read in thy sinful blue eye
A trusting love that could fade nor die.

Once more I drank in the speechless bliss
Thy presence gave to the soul of mine,
Again I pressed a passionate kiss
Of wildest love on the lips of thine.
Oh, God! that I e'er should awakened be,
From such rapturous dreams that come to me.

Side by side in the moon-lit glade—
An in happier days forever gone—
All through the silent night we strayed,
And drank from the brook and over the lawn.
And where the rose and the violet bloom,
Shedding around their rich perfume.

And then a change o'er my vision came;
Cold and ghastly I saw thee lay,
Wildly I called upon thy name,
But thy blest spirit had passed away—
Passed to the home of light and love,
To dwell with the pure in heart above.

O the anguish that filled my heart,
When I beheld thee pale and dead,
Nought could solace to me impart,
Hope and the love of life was fled.
And I awoke to my grief anew,
And sigh to think that my dream is true.

NEW YORK, April, 1868.

NORMA DANTON;

OR THE

ORPHAN OF THE LIGHT HOUSE

TALE OF FRAUD AND REVENGE.

CHAPTER XXII.

James Danton chuckled with horrid glee over the issue of his disguised plans. One object of his life was, at length, achieved, but his victim had taken refuge in death, and so he lost the sweetest part of his revenge—the watching the bitter throes and writhings of a soul struggling to regain its tarnished honor.

Otis Marshall, too, was ruined in the downfall of the Lochmans, but he was young and could retrieve his fortunes; and Mr. Danton made him a splendid offer, for May's sake, which he concluded to accept, proposals for May's sake, also.

Otis Marshall paused to ask himself, "Do I love May Danton? Interested I certainly am, but who would not be when her interest is so evident."

He was not heartless in thus speculating on the state of his feelings. He wished, perhaps, to marry, but had not yet met his prototype; hence his wonder at his indifference, so apparent to himself when discussing the momentous question, "shall I or shall not marry May Danton?"

Otis Marshall had never loved, else he could not have debated so coolly; but when the tempest came which made his bankrupt, and May's father was the first to offer his business assistance—to place at his disposal such sums as would set him on his feet again, and reinstate him in his former position among business men, although his mother's fortune was sufficient for that, he could not but feel grateful to the daughter for the father's kindness and friendship, and he thought warmly, almost lovingly, of May as he acknowledged her father's well-timed benefaction.

And who could guess that, beneath those specious smiles and fair promises of James Danton, lurked the black heart of a villain, now striving to wash itself clean in the first gracious impulse of a life time? For, although the carrion bird of remorse screamed over his head, "Where are thy brothers and children?" still, it had not yet fixed its merciless beak in his heart, and he could escape from the cry without disburning his ill-gotten gains.

May heard from her father's lips the story of what he had done for the object of her idolatry, and with a glowing cheek thanked him for the pains he had taken, while her heart fluttered with hopes too sweet for utterance.

Otis came often, but never could his lips frame the little words which only needed to be breathed to make May all his own. His frank heart could not, would not, speak deceitfully; still, it was happiness to her to know him near, to listen to his voice, to sit beside him, and sometimes touch his hand in the plain courtesies of daily intercourse. But when he called her May, as he sometimes did, authorized by her long friendship, oh, it was such happiness! The music of his voice sent the warm blood thrilling through her veins. She was a woman, and she loved!

CHAPTER XXIII.

Poor old Mrs. Janison had been ill of a fever, and Bell was like a ministering angel in the sick chamber. Now the old lady was recovering, but she could not bear that the young girl should return to her former employment.

Mrs. Janison was a woman much respected in her own neighborhood, and her recent illness had developed the good qualities of her near neighbors; and feeling herself surrounded by so many friends during her convalescence, she formed a plan in her own mind of benefitting her young charge through their influence, and keeping her in a more quiet sphere. The neighbors said she was too delicate to be allowed to go to a workshop.

"Then we must find employment for her nearer home."

"And that can be easily done, since she stitches so nicely. There's Mrs. Marshall will pay a good price for a sempstress to take the place of hers, who is just married. She is very particular, but I am sure your girl will suit her. It is so handy, she can be at home more and night with you."

CHAPTER THE BURGLER SHOWING CRIS HIS "LADY JULIA."

She would often take her to drive with her, or send her on errands involving pleasant walks, which greatly modified the unfavorable effect which follows as a necessity in the path of those who live by the needle.

Mrs. Marshall was the worthy mother of a worthy son—her only child. Otis dwelt beneath her roof, and was to her as the apple of her eye.

Bell had been about three weeks in Mrs. Marshall's employ, when she met, by accident, for the first time the son of whom she had heard the mother so often speak. She had returned to the house for a message she had not fully understood, and Mrs. Marshall sent for her to come to the drawing-room, where she was sitting with her son. She looked so innocently beautiful in her simple white gown and plain straw bonnet, that Otis (man of the world as he was, and accustomed to notice only elegant and graceful women) was struck with her unique beauty, and when she had retired again was so quietly as she entered he could not forbear questioning his mother concerning the sweet vision which had so charmed him.

"Who is this pretty girl, mother?"

"My sempstress, Otis. She is more than pretty; she is beautiful, and you know I have a penchant for beauty always."

"And you have surpassed your usual success in this instance. Why, mother, she must be some regal strayed or stolen. I never saw a more perfect picture of one."

"She is no picture, I assure you, my son, but a bona fide flesh and blood woman, who seems most industriously for her living. But certainly, possessing grace of manner and intelligence far superior to her station."

"Where does she come from?"

"She is an orphan, and a relative or protege of old Mrs. Janison. I think I have heard a vague report of her having been found in the street by Janison the policeman, and carried home to his mother, who claimed her as a distant relative, or else I dreamed it. But, although they are very respectable persons and have seen better days, I don't think she belongs to them."

"Nor I either," replied Otis; and the conversation dropped. But afterward, whenever Otis Marshall sat beside Bell, and looked in her earnest face, the beautiful sewing-girl seemed to fill he tween them. It haunted him. He grew restless and reflective by turns, and behaved at himself for allowing a creature so humble to obtrude herself upon his thoughts. But the image had found an unoccupied niche in his heart, and was immovably ensconced therein, notwithstanding the master's petulant plucking at it.

Weigh in ! how rarely it occurs to one how many impressions we make face must be scattered about the universe, daguerreotyped here and there, without leave of the owner. Eyes are said to be windows of the soul. Justice—standing by, utterly unconscious of the moral decision. It matters but little, the one that takes strongest will be sure to be most lasting.

So thought Ethel Danton, the most successful "lady killer" in town, as he sipped the sweets from the fairest flowers, and went on heedless of the blight and foul things he touched in passing. With his boon companions over the convivial cup, his success with the fair was a topic for jest, and free discourse, and such light badinage as young men of fashion oft indulge, most pitiful to record when remembering they all had mothers.

Even Mrs. Newbold did not escape the naming, when wine flowed freely and tongues were loose with wanton thoughts. She was a fair mark for the arrows of mischief, and receiving so much of the attention of a young debonnair like Ethel could not fail to make her much observed, perhaps much abused. To be sure she was his sister's friend, yet brown were filled, lips pursed, eyes twinkled knowingly, and with a monstrous shrugging of pretty shoulders when the charms of the married belle were doubted or discussed. Even her friends allowed "she was a thoughtless creature."

If they had better understood the wayward tenderness of the pound of flesh, which, by mistake, often called a heart, when beating in the breast of passionate folly, when its role compare to the instinct of a rain friendly, all his indulgence in because, the wildest verdict would not have been that she was thoughtless; but those who believe themselves friends have little of each other, and seldom woman can play the saddest pranks, even in the very eyes of kindest friends, and yet escape detection. Such an one only help it if Mercury and Venus preside at one's birth? how can one be expected to control the many crafty rules laid down by the fathers patriarchal from time immemorial?

Hatty Newbold, though beautiful as an anophore of the most refined conversation, which might have corrupted a saving influence, and perhaps did to a certain extent, adopted a doubtful philosophy which taught the worship and glorification of self. She was brave in her daring, cowardly in her concealing, but her husband with his armor of affection shielded her from the malicious eyes of flaw pickers, although he knew not such eyes were upon her. She was all to him he asked, and his penetration never went deep enough to discover that he was not all in all to her. Men are often vain that way. They think because a fair lady pleases them, and fills quite full their hearts, they cannot but be well mated.

He was pleased to gratify her every wish, to meet her slightest desire. He gave her a carriage and pair by Jamison the policeman, and carried home to his mother, who claimed her as a distant relative, or else I dreamed it. But, although they are very respectable persons and have seen better days, I don't think she belongs to them."

"Nor I either," replied Otis; and the conversation dropped. But afterward, whenever Otis Marshall sat beside Bell, and looked in her earnest face, the beautiful sewing-girl seemed to fill between them. It haunted him. He grew restless and reflective by turns, and behaved at himself for allowing a creature so humble to obtrude herself upon his thoughts. But the image had found an unoccupied niche in his heart, and was immovably ensconced therein, notwithstanding the master's petulant plucking at it.

Weigh in ! how rarely it occurs to one how many impressions we make face must be scattered about the universe, daguerreotyped here and there, without leave of the owner. Eyes are said to be windows of the soul. Justice—standing by, utterly unconscious of the moral decision. It matters but little, the one that takes strongest will be sure to be most lasting.

So thought Ethel Danton, the most successful "lady killer" in town, as he sipped the sweets from the fairest flowers, and went on heedless of the blight and foul things he touched in passing. With his boon companions over the convivial cup, his success with the fair was a topic for jest, and free discourse, and such light badinage as young men of fashion oft indulge, most pitiful to record when remembering they all had mothers.

Even Mrs. Newbold did not escape the naming, when wine flowed freely and tongues were loose with wanton thoughts. She was a fair mark for the arrows of mischief, and receiving so much of the attention of a young debonnair like Ethel could not fail to make her much observed, perhaps much abused. To be sure she was his sister's friend, yet brown were filled, lips pursed, eyes twinkled knowingly, and with a monstrous shrugging of pretty shoulders when

"If I would suit her I would like it better than going to the shop," said the young girl.

It was tried. Bell did suit Mrs. Marshall, and she could now devote more time to her invalid friend, who was but slowly recovering from her attack.

In a little time, Mrs. Marshall grew very fond of her beautiful sewing-girl, and from her partiality showered upon her many favors (a which poor sewing-girls are in general strange

"If I would suit her I would like it better than going to the shop," said the young girl.

It was tried. Bell did suit Mrs. Marshall, and she could now devote more time to her invalid friend, who was but slowly recovering from her attack.

In a little time, Mrs. Marshall grew very fond of her beautiful sewing-girl, and from her partiality showered upon her many favors (a which poor sewing-girls are in general strange strong insensibility to everything but self-interest. But the glance of the eye alone was not enough to make one shudder, if the head had escaped observation. But the long hair trained to conceal could not quite do so. The ears hung exposed and the fingers from the right hand were also wanting to make up the man, so debased from the image after which he was fashioned.

The shorter of the two took his pipe from his lips and knocking the ashes therefrom, spoke gruffly to his companion. "I say, Cris, this ain't no sort of country for respectable pals like us to get our midgin in free cost for snuffin. Sharp police out there eye on a gemman, never takes it off. No chance to do business of a private nater in these wide streets, and such an infernal glowering of gas glums, can't tip the wink to a cove at your elbow, but gruffly the star steps up and says, 'Vot, vot you doin' here?' and as for hale, do you call that hale," throwing the powder mug containing the liquid into his companion's face, who seized the beer so temptingly presented, and drained its contents at a draught. Then slowly wiping the foam from his mouth with his unarmed hand, he replied to the following effect, employing many slang phrases perhaps in order to make himself more intelligible to his companion: "That ain't so bad, but this is a precious place to get cleaved up. Of course there's anybody out but us to excite suspicion, eh? no, by no means! You and I looks like gentlemen of the turf, a little distinguished of course; yes, a little distinguished, but by no means remarkable. Now, nobody would think we could ever sling a slug, or trip a trawler, and could never dream we'd well we've served her Majesty, in her private dominions, at her special request. Let's have some more ale. Ah, here it comes, and a bloodhound, when he tracks the scent. Besides, Charlie, you didn't think I requested you to bring me here just to see you gamble ale, and find fault with it, did you?"

"Well no, pal, to tell the truth——"

"That's what you seldom do," interrupted Cris; "so don't attempt it; it's like trying to catch a gull with your learned."

"Well so it is. I shan't try. I know'd you wanted sunthin' neat done, sunthin' in my style. Hey, what's the row, and what's to pay? You must plank the shiners, no trusting old friends in a strange land, specially if you knows 'em not," and he grinned a horrid grin at the cully, blue eyes, "case you see this sin't summer where a pal shows his ground, and can take a back seat to get out of the way of the enemy's chess."

"You're broke down, Charlie, you are; you're a-most clean gone man! You're as timid as a female woman that hain't no pap for her squaller. You're frightened about the cove hurt."

"You lie, Cris, ere to back it, if you say so." And he drew a pair of small pistols from his breast, handing one to his comrade, as he spoke.

"Put yup your barkers, man; only wanted to try your stuff; good as new; all right, old pal; put up your barkers. Hazzone pair, where did you get 'em?"

"I did a gentleman a small service on evening, relieved him of a small quantity of unnecessary articles, unnecessary in course to one as was found missing and turned up nine days after a feaster, as was supposed had drowned himself into eternity, though foul play was suspected from some ugly marks about the neck."

"How did you stop the blab when he had the barkers?" inquired Cris, with some show of curiosity.

"Easy enuff, same Lady Julia helped me; you see this ere," as after a wary glance around him, he drew from the neighborhood of the pistols a small roll of bumpers cord, curiously knotted at one end, and looped with a noose at the other.

"What's that?" said Cris.

The horrid wretch leaned forward till his face almost touched his companion's, and slowly uttered one single word, at which, if possible, the cold face of Cris turned colder, although he repeated the word after him, "Burke!"

"Burke!"

"Never stare man. I was one of Burke's best pals, never mind my present venue either. I brought more money to my master than all the other cows put together, though they did bring up Sergeis for their share. I am the only one left of the gang, the only one as knows the secret. I can throw the loop at ten paces, and make my man true as the needle to the pint of the smithee. I catches the bird while he beats bush, hey, Cris?"

"I don't see how it's done," said Cris.

"Lord, on don't? I'll show no."

In an instant the wretch had taken his distance outside the door of the tap-room, and before the tall villain could speak, the noose was thrown skillfully from the distance, so quickly as though the disciple of Burke were making him, as he called it, by the neck. He could only gurgle out a sound, unable to utter a single word, so swift and sure was the method of dispatch; but it was not the intention of Cheffie to murder him; another instant and he withdrew the noose, and left him to choke himself clear of the disagreeable experience of hanging which, though he had often come near, never so near as to taste it before.

"Got your infernal rope out of my sight," said he huskily, as soon as he could articulate.

"Ha! ha! ain't it effectual?" chuckled the Burker. "I'll be it cause it's so quiet."

"That fact isn't to be disputed," replied Cris, and he resumed himself at the table with the cull, "being me some brandy; a damned unpleasant sensation hanging must have about the throat."

"Oh! a cove is soon cured when it comes to that," said the Burker. With horrid facetiousness they bandied jest after jest, while applying themselves to the strong liquor before them, without regard to quantity or quality.

"Now," said Cheffie, "spot me your man, and let's to business."

"No such strong matter. The man ain't easily spotted, because the spot's very uncertain. It isn't a man that is wanted. Do you take?"

"Hum! Well I mought be able to smell your meaning."

"If it was old enough," said Cris, laying his finger horizontally across his nose. "That's the devil of it, it mustn't be too old."

"Have 'em fresh as you like, a gentle hug from lady Julia sets that all right," and he placed his hand caressingly on the hempen cord in his bosom.

"Oh! cause Lady Julia if that's what you mean," said Cris with a rueful grimace as the recollection of his late recent acquaintance with the hugging capacity of Cheffie's bosom comprehension, "and a word of advice in season. Don't attempt anything of the sort in this country, for if you're blowed you'll be bound for life for carrying off the dead body of a pauper for the scientific gentlemen to exhibit their brains on; and, after all, what do they know more for cutting and slashing the dead flesh and tumbling the cold blood and senseless nerves from their places, the blood ain't the same it was. They say the heart's a heart but what of that. They talk learnedly about chemical changes. It's my private opinion that death, taken into a man's system, produces about as much effect of a chemical change as anything that can be amalgamated."

"Hold on Cris, seems to me you're dipping deep into them doctor swells; they're a cursed pack, get paid for all the murders they commit while we cage who do the killing. Come, without turning a man's stomach, why we has to jeopardize our necks for taking off a few just to keep our hands in."

"Well," said Cris, "all that's wanted now is a customer or two for the climbing room entrance; there's carcass of the pay" and he placed a piece of gold in the ready hand of Cheffie, "and as much more when the job is done."

"Taint much," said Cheffie with a disdained grunt, "but it may open the door to sunthin better. When is the job to do?"

"Meet me here to-morrow night, we'll take a social nap and be off to the plan. Now we'll take separate roads, as two such very distinguished-looking individuals might attract the particular attention of the authorities," and the two parties sunk away to their dens to spend the day which was now dawning, in sleeping off the effects of the very tame revel, or rather to keep out of sight until the evening when they would again resume their carrion bids to mature their nefarious projects.

CHAPTER XXV.

Some hours later Hatty Newbold and Ethel Danton conversed in low tones in the lady's boudoir. She held her guitar in her hand which ever and anon she touched with trembling fingers as her impassioned lover pat some hasty question which it seemed she dared not directly answer.

"Hatty you own you love me and yet you refuse me, how can you make me happy?"

"Because a cause of duty withholds me."

"Duty! you care no duty but to yourself and me. The bird and a ripe, the happy crowds everything invites, youth, beauty, love. The world smiles upon us both, and you tell me you shan't shall we heed it; a foreign land will be our home. Queen of my soul consent."

"Ethel, Ethel, how can I be cruel to me, and though I have discovered too late that I do not love him yet I fear to snap the bond of sympathy and that I owe him gratitude."

"That is impossible. How can you bear the thought of living as the wife of one you do not love?"

"Tis at least safer than to live with one I love without that claim."

"Can you love I go alone?" and he leant forward till his mouth touched her beautiful lips. She raised her eyes to his and then as suddenly dowly in the bright orbs. His head clasped hers with a warm pressure as it lay on the bosom of the guitar and the instrument sent forth a mournful trill. Her head dropped upon his shoulder. The vow "to love honor and obey" was forgotten, passion had predominated.

"I could not live without you. I will go with you," she murmured. Poor woman! even her struggle was weakness.

"Day after to-morrow then, dearest, when the English steamer leaves the pier she will bear me over the sea, and you will be all mine forever."

"All yours forever," she whispered.

Ethel Danton sealed his loyalty on the fair hand of Hatty Newbold. They were to meet evening and the next at parties, the first at Mrs. Newbold's own house, the second at Mr. Danton's where a select few were asked to say good bye to young Danton as he went abroad; and they would join the revels of the innocent and gay and seem as joyous and indifferent as though no dark secret called about their hearts. They tacitly avoided each other, and somebody had the impudence to remark that Ethel Danton had danced but once with Mrs. Newbold and there must be something in the wind, "for he leaves the country day after to-morrow."

Mr. Newbold caught the whisper. Jealousy is of quick growth. His first impulse was to grasp the miscreant by the throat who had dared couple his wife's name with a doubt and make him answer dearly for the insult and such repayal of the hospitalities of the house in which he was an invited guest. But he checked himself instantly as an unwelcome reflection in an opposite mirror flashed on his eye. It was but a single look exchanged between his wife and

Ethel Danton. It gave him an agua chill; twas but a look he tried to reason, perhaps meant nothing, but it haunted him the whole long night.

Soon the fete was done, their guests were gone and they were left alone, each with a private cause for restless thought of which the other might not know. He had determined one thing; to be convinced through his own eyes and ears ere he would chide her.

The light of morning flashed its rosy beams throughout her chamber. Mr. Newbold gazed on the face of his young wife, at rest in the pillow close beside him, or simulating sleep so well it might be mistaken for reality. He contemplated her face, he knew she was pure and loved society but doubt her truth he could not, would not. He longed to waken her and tell her of the thoughts that like a thief had stolen upon him, ask her if she were happy and he could do aught to increase the measure of it, but she slept so calmly, so deeply, so like a child not disturb her by so much as a gentle kiss, though he could have been such joy to him to feel her lips press warm against his own. He would not waken her, and with the comfort which perusal of her face, so sweetly ingenious in youth and beauty, gave him, he left asleep and when she woke Hetty was in her dressing room.

She met him with the same calm indifference that had marked her converse with him for many weeks, and half his doubts returned but half he could not bear to worry her with his sick, jealous fancies.

The pangs of jealousy are like attacks of intermittent fever: it goes and comes, and when the fit is on conviction is more than certainty, when it leaves one for a little it seems that the mind certainly might be convinced into nothing.

His thoughts were more at home than they had been for months and he left the confidential room early in the day and went there. He went into the library. Mrs. Newbold was in the little glass of a boudoir where she seemed to live. He ascertained from the servants that she had visitors. He did not like to disturb her in his wife had visitors, but as he passed the half-closed door he heard the voice of Ethel Danton. And he thought he would go in and watch for the momentary generosity that always accompanies jealousy in a noble mind, he wondered at himself that he should feel more anxious to see his wife that day than any other day in the whole year. Yet his voice was husky as he ordered wine to be brought him. He was fearfully restless, walked hurriedly up and down the room, great drops of perspiration rolled from his face. He was unnerved by his doubt again. He knocked at his wife's door.

"Come in," she was alone. "Are you ill Mr. Newbold?" exclaimed Hatty, startled at his entered.

"No, yes, Hatty I believe I am ill, but I don't know what ails me," he said, with a faint attempt at a smile.

"Will you have a physician?"

"Oh no I am not ill enough for that; are you a good nurse Hatty? I believe I must nurse little wife at once or I have not yet." There was something very touching in the face and the tones of the voice of the strong man, but he leant to the weaker in that moment of suffering.

"I'm afraid I am not a very good nurse," replied the wife, "but if you are really ill I will do my best to—to—relieve you."

"You will. It almost makes me well to hear you say so Hatty; kiss me dear. It seems as if I had not seen you for weeks except at a distance and with a gulf between us. I hope it is not impassable. I hope so Hatty, for I love you very tenderly; and I could not bear that you should not love me, as I have told you sometimes you do not. But why do you turn so pale and gasp so, darling? Have I hurt you with my rude fancies? Forgive me, I'll never speak of it again," and he knelt down trying to soothe his wife. She was wildly weeping, leaning on the arm of the couch where she had found out her yesterday when she made that promise to Ethel.

A wild impulse seized her to unfold all to her husband, for his sufferings touched her, and the agree of anguish that shook her, seemed to have purified her and so thunder does the air; but alas! she did not yield to the diviner impulse, she bow smote of sorrow had been spared her. Poor thing, she is a stranger to her own heart still; but in a fearful moment she will stand confronted with the truth.

Mr. Newbold blamed himself for thus disturbing and making her unhappy, and did he but to calm the tempest he had raised. At last the sobs were hushed, and seeming quiet was regained.

Mrs. Newbold wrote a note to excuse herself to May Danton. She felt too wretched for a party that night, "a farewell party too," a tear fell on the paper as she thought "it is the last time I can call May friend, though I must love her more than ever. Oh! dear Ethel, for your sake what do I not resign, home, kindred, friends, and that most priceless jewel of a woman's soul, my honour, all given up. I do not regret my promise," and a gleam of that new philosophy shone out to comfort her; "for if I love him as I feel I do, that love will support me in the deed, and make me worthier. I think I'm acting justly to myself, and surely I am to my own great end. I must be true to the best dictates of my nature. Oh! I am so bewildered I know not true from false. Am I deceived? Oh, for one word from Ethel; he is also can reassure me."

It was one of the grand gala nights at the Danton's. The house was illuminated and decorated with the usual regardlessness of expense on such occasions. Mrs. Danton, fidgetous as ever, all smiles to her guests, though of course a fashionable degree of graceful sadness on the eve of her son's departure mingled with them, and Mr. Danton, boasting with urbanity and benevolence, did the honours of the minority fete with unsurpassed dignity. With May there was something lacking to make up her joy. In the first place, Mrs. Newbold had excused herself, which was a decided disappointment; then from Otis Marchal came a kind note regretting his inability to be with them on that evening. May had many regrets to master. Ethel was more than usually pale, but her toilet was from his lips sparkling and profuse. He must at least to leave a reputation for wit behind him. He said good bye to the elegant bar child spoke to he bosom, and the hot tears flowed fast.

Poor Lucy Marston! Six years before she had given her heart and hand to Alfred Marston, and in all the great city there was not a happier woman. Then only nineteen years of age, she looked forward upon the course with all the high hopes of the joyful, noble heart; and if there was one source to which, more than all others, she looked for lasting peace and joy, it was to the generous, devoted love of her husband. Alfred was then a clerk in a wholesale establishment, receiving a good salary, and laying up money. And for just four years of just such happiness as Lucy had hoped for. But a cloud at length arose, and now it hung like a dark pall over her way. She had seen it from the moment when it first rose in the pearness in the horizon, but she could not make her husband see it. He had only laughed at her fears, and at times he had been really offended because of the fears which she held.

And now Alfred Marston was out of business, having no article of his own to sell, no one would trust him; and he had even sold some articles of furniture to obtain the bare means of existence.

The clock struck eleven, and the weeping wife and mother was upon the point of putting her child to bed, when a loud knock came at the door, and shortly afterwards the bell rang. She recoiled from the sound, and turned with terror to the door, where she found her policemen with her husband.

"Is this the home of this man, ma'am?" one of the men asked.

"Yes, sir," gasped Lucy. "Oh! is he hurt?" she cried, springing to his side.

Oh! how those harsh, unfeeling words struck upon the poor woman's ears!

A faint cry burst from the wife turned towards the stairs and the policemen followed her leading her husband. Into the neatly-arranged chamber the guided them, and having reached the bed she drew back the outer coverlet, and the stout men lifted the insensible form upon it.

"Is he dangerously injured?" the utterance of them, as he stepped back from the bed. "Perhaps you are his wife, ma'am?"

"Yes, sir," Lucy whispered, with a mighty effort.

"Well, well—they will do so; but what fun they find it I cannot see. And such a wife, too! But can't ye persuade his to stay in to-morrow? We shall have to take him up now. What a fool?"

And with these words the officers left. Lucy conducted them to the door, and then she returned to the kitchen where she had left her child. He was seated on the floor, and was striking him she carried him up and put him into his little bed. Then she took the light and went for her husband, and found him stretched upon the bleated and distorted features, and then she sank down upon her knees.

"Oh, God! if there be one mercy on him! Save him! Oh, save him! Alfred—my husband! Oh! you'll kill your wife and child! your best, best friend, Alfred!"

The distant bell sounded the hour of twelve as the unhappy wife lay down by the side of her child to pray. She had prayed for her husband's side, for in his will, maniac dreams he wandered in diverse directions, and at the solemn tones of the midnight bell sounded through the heavy air they struck upon her soul like the knell of departed hope. One plaint left her lips—oh save him!" she sank into an uneasy slumber.

The morning broke dull and gloomy, with clouds and rain; and Alfred Marston awoke with an aching head and parching lips. He asked for water, and it was by his side in a moment. He grasped the pitcher to both his shaking hands, and drank deeply. He did not look his wife in the face, but with a deep groan he sank back upon his pillow and closed his bloodshot eyes. Light the middle of afternoon he got up and tried to eat something, but he could not. His stomach could not bear the idea. All day long he lay in a kind of stupor, the ache of the night before, and though she could not smile, yet she was mild and gentle, and her heart was more grieved than ever.

Towards the middle of the afternoon Alfred fell asleep, and his wife took her sewing and sat down by the window at the foot of the bed. An hour afterwards her child came in and sat down by her side. The step of those tiny feet was hardly enough to awaken a man from such a sleep, but yet he awoke. Perhaps there was some angel presence flitting around that boy that flapped his wings close upon the sleeper's ears, and then started him up from his sleep. But though he awoke, yet he did not speak. He lay there, and his breathing was long and heavy as before, so his wife supposed he still slumbered.

"Mama," spoke the boy, loud enough for the father to hear distinctly, "is papa sick?"

"Yes, my child. Don't make a noise."

"I won't," said the little voice, softly, but yet plainly. "But is papa very sick?"

"Yes, Freddy."

For some moments the child was silent, and he seemed pondering deeply upon some interesting topic. At length he said,—and there was a hopefulness in his tone—

"Mama, wasn't papa sick when he struck you?"

"Hush—yes, Freddy. But you mustn't speak of it again. He didn't mean to strike me."

"I shouldn't think he would strike such a good mama."

"He won't again, Freddy."

"But will he ever love me again, mama? Will he ever kiss me again as he used to?"

"Oh, my child!"

"But I won't wake papa up. Do tell me if papa will ever love us any more. Oh—I hope papa will."

"So he will, Freddy."

There was another silence of some moments, and then the child spoke again, and this time with a simple earnestness that seemed strange for one of his years:

"Mama, can God hear us when we talk to him?"

"Yes—yes, my child."

"But I won't wake papa up. Do tell me if papa will ever love us any more. Oh—I hope papa will."

"So he will, Freddy."

There was another silence of some moments, and then the child spoke again, and this time with a simple earnestness that seemed strange for one of his years:

"Mama, can God hear us when we talk to him?"

"Yes—yes, my child."

"Then I'll ask him to make papa love us again."

"Hush, Freddy. But you must speak of it again. He didn't mean to strike me."

"I shouldn't think he would strike such a good mama."

"He won't again, Freddy."

"But will he ever love me again, mama? Will he ever kiss me again as he used to?"

"Oh, my child!"

THE NEW YORK LEDGER

PHANTOM WHISPERS.

BY EMILY P. LESSENDEEL.

Hours of loneliness remembered,
Moments, dear ones, the Past have sealed,
While to eyes that never slumbered,
Hands the naked soul revealed.

Here are none to scath my anguish,
None to count the sighs I heave:
Then on Thou's grave shrove I languish,
And o'er sad memorials grieve.

Through the silent, dusky dowery,
Creeping phantoms, on they come,
Stealing in, in ghostly array,
Fit around my chill hearthstone.

Mingling their sepulchred whispers
Thrust me with the wasted hours,
With them come two large flowers,
In their pale hands clasping flowers.

These they strive to weave in garlands,
For the mourner's doubting brow;
But the blossoms plucked in far-lands,
Earth-side quickly wither now.

And they fall as dead as ashes
On the stone my tears have worn;
So, the wreathed human dashes
Hopes that o'er of heaven are born.

Hopes with gleams of consolation
Flickering through the sombre gloom,
Through the brooding desolation
Above the dwellers of the tomb.

Haunting faces dimly shaded
With long tresses, golden hued,
Earnest eyes that early faded
Quenched in death, with tears beloved;

Glancing fond with tendered meaning,
Beckon me with them to go;
And, on spirit-bosoms leaning,
Sleep from every sense of woe.

In the cold realms of obstruction,
Fold the careless hands from toil;
Let the sphere-reel be shattering,
Quit the warfare, spurn the toil.

Lift the veil that shrouds the Silo,
Glean the mystery, "ere thine;
All that is, must be, and right is,
Snatch the cup and drain the wine.

In that deep oblivion's quiet,
Dreamless years shall onward roll,
Cycling age by mainly rich,
O'er thy still unconscious soul.

"Sleep—forget—thy cares are banished
With the close of life's dull hour!"
Slowly, then, the phantoms vanished,
Vanished through the shadowy door.

Yes, they have the truth outspoken!
Time is palsy-struck with age;
My life's golden bowl is broken,
Hint my name from off the page.

But the little angel lingers
With soft wings, as still as snow,
Folded me, with tearful whispers,
Murmuring, "Mother do not go."

THE VEILED LADY;

OR,

HARVEY BRADFORD'S INSPIRATION.

BY MRS. MARY C. VAUGHAN.

God hath created sights
As well as days to deck the varied globe;
Peace comes as oft, and in the dusky robe
Of twilight as in white attire. SEARMONT.

Years ago, I suppose it is not necessary to tell how many—when I was a little girl, I used to go every Sabbath to a quiet New England church, or meeting-house as it was termed in primitive country parlance. This meeting-house stood in the midst of an extensive green, with long rows of sheds behind it, where the country people tied their horses and left them, all day, with the hay which they brought for that purpose in their great wagons or sleighs, which also contained sundry baskets of nice things for their own consumption.

This church was small and primitive in construction, though the exterior was neatly painted white, and it had in its small belfry a tinkling bell which seemed to have the mountain echos, or tolled, in solemn numbers, the age of each parishioner for miles around, as to the sacrificial fate of the world, "and swung mournfully as his friends and neighbors bore him to his last rest. No paint or fresco, however, adorned its interior. The wooden galleries, the square boxes called pews, even the pulpit were of deal, brown brown and mellow-tinted with age.

The pulpit deserves a separate paragraph, for never since have I seen its like. Imagine a square box of unpainted boards, some eight feet in height, with a wooden railing at top, and in the center a reading desk with a cushion on cushion, evidently a pulpit, but with no visible means of ingress. A narrow space in front of the pulpit was railed off, a door was opened into this space, and a door of similar dimensions appeared in front of the pulpit. Probably there were stairs beneath the platform for the officiating clergyman, after disappearing through this door, would presently be seen emerging above the railing of the desk. It is he currently related that a strange minister, who once exchanged with our pastor, after vainly endeavoring to discover the way to the pulpit, was forced to seek the guidance of Deacon Morrison, and finally appeared above the desk with crimsoned cheeks, and in a profuse perspiration.

On the left of this pulpit was the pew of the "Squire," as the great man of the place was called, and on the right the Deacon's pew, square and known like the rest, but larger, and commanding a view of the whole house.

The Pastor of our little church, at the period when our story opens, was a young man, a recent graduate, who had come with reluctance and humility to fill the place of old Parson Green, who, not long before, had died, after having ministered to that congregation more than forty years.

Parson Green had married, and baptised, and stood by the graves of the people of Chichester all those years; and every Sabbath he had broken to them the bread of life. All loved him. The young remembered him. The old had seen his locks whiten with their own. He had shared the joys and sorrows of the middle-aged. His was to each as father, or as friend. So when Harvey Bradford was invited to take his place, it is not surprising that he shrunk from a position which another had filled so worthily. He expected criticism and censure. Belonging to another generation his ways, he well knew, were not as Parson Green's ways, and he had made them most acceptable to the people of Chichester.

Sunday after Sunday, Harvey Bradford climbed into that tall pulpit, and gazed down with a sick heart upon those shrewd, brown faces all turned toward him attentively, but, as he well read, their expression keenly critical. His sermons were earnest and pathetic, or powerful and convincing, but they were not like old Parson Green's, and he knew that instead of pondering the truths uttered, every mind, less voluntarily, busied itself in comparisons which prejudice and habit would not allow to be just.

Harvey Bradford was born a genius, but poverty and the thousand circumstances of an adverse fate had, not a blight, dwarfed and repressed his powers. By dint of struggle he had acquired his profession, and that struggle had made him humble. He was scarcely more conscious of his powers than his shrewd, but clumsy parishioners, but he felt as all who are surrounded by ungenial influences do, the want of appreciation, and, even more, the want of love.

It is true there was no lack of attention. The young pastor was beset by invitations to tea-parties, and his reading and sermon-making sadly interrupted by calls. There were a good many young and rosy maidens—quite ladies in his congregation who, probably, had no objection to the idea of the cares and duties of a minister's wife, and who, at any rate, manifested their kind feelings toward their bachelor minister by a thousand delicate attentions. And while the fathers and mothers were well-mannered officiousness, reminded him of Parson Green's ways, their daughters complimented him warmly on every thing indescribable which is felt and consciously introduced.

In spite of the humility and want of self-appreciation, Harvey had begun to be dimly conscious that he had the ability to improve upon the old-time manner of pastoral attention to him, and all that was expressed in her countenance was felt in her heart. She gloried in the noble intellect and heart she loved, her heart throbbed to every eloquent word as if she had originated it. She was elevated quite out of herself, into a region where there was no self, which even her clear, high intellect usually dwelt.

It is needless to tell how Harvey Bradford sought the presence and society of this rare woman, every opportunity. There was much in common between two such minds, even if love were out of the question. But Harvey Bradford did love, and helped, and hoped before he was beloved. He was as one inspired. His people began to admire, to love, finally to appreciate him. Their kindness to him grew to hopes, grew strong and subtle in its manifestations. Through the night of his great love for Ellen Morrison, he was not quite blind to the warmth which continually emanated from his own. It was beautiful to see how the expression of his own nature operated upon the shrewd, unreasoned natures around him. His sermons—the lives of the whole people—began to drew into sympathy and harmonious at it mingled among the elements which composed those once repugnant materials.

But the time for Elizabeth's return to her school approached. Then Harvey Bradford felt that he must speak or die.

One evening the two sat conversing long until the sun had set, and the twilight shadows began to deepen around them. Then he had talked much of life and its uses and purposes. Insensibly the conversation approached personal matters, and the hour came for Harvey Bradford to learn if his life was to be blessed or darkened. He spoke, and then he learned for the first time that Ellen Morrison was already affianced. The eldest son of Squire Ellis was in Europe, and when he returned he was to marry Elizabeth Morrison.

Elizabeth was too noble to have deceived Bradford. She respected his character, valued her engagement, and had thus suffered their friendship to grow unrestrained till, with a sigh of deep regret, she had confessed her position. She often intruded upon that niche in her heart where long ago she had enshrined her absent lover.

Had there been no Alfred Ellis, she would have felt that it was a deep, tender regard upon Bradford's bosom and felt that her life-destiny was to be nobly humiliated in keeping back and closing up from him the career she anticipated for one so gifted.

But Elizabeth was of the old Puritan stock, and her sense of honor was a little over-delicate duty. She felt as she had been taught, for in this instance she dared not listen to the whisperings of inclination, or the admonitions of reason, that an engagement was only less sacred and inviolable than marriage itself. Absolution, too, whispered of the wealth and love which would accompany her union with Alfred Ellis, and she was made a child, for she was not quite angelic, from the privations and the hopeless struggles through which Harvey Bradford must pass before he could assert itself, and his career be crowned with success.

But of all this she said nothing. She spoke only of her engagement, and of her regret that a knowledge of it had not interposed to prevent the growth of an attachment, on his part, which she feared would cause him pain. How much this calm answer could her heart say! how. Some women have a wonderful power of concealing emotion, and speaking in calm, unvarying tones in the midst of the deepest depths of suffering!

As for Harvey Bradford he went forth from her presence that night completely stunned and bewildered. He sought his own home almost unconsciously, and sat down with a vain effort to think. But only the fact of his rejection occupied his mind. His brain seemed on fire. He had suddenly lost his mental equilibrium. For a little while he had trodden on firm ground, but now lift, and hope, and ambition—everything seemed shifting from beneath him. He was sinking in the treacherous quicksands of despair.

But suddenly a luminous thought shot athwart the darkness, and while its rays pierced his brain, and brought a keener pain, they also brought an intense delight. He knew that Elizabeth loved him. The subtle magnetism which prevaded their natures would permit no such vital secret to remain barred between them, now that love had been outspoken. Yes, he knew that his love was returned!

This knowledge brought conflicting thoughts. He felt now for the first time, but only because he had just before considered it, that marriage, not only with love, but without the supremest love is a hideous, living lie, and the basest theft upon God's image in man. But he belonged to a sect, and, great and strong as he was, he, too, like Elizabeth, was still the slave of sectism and parochial beliefs.

He only must be told Elizabeth is the man she now loved, if at all, but secondarily, but his duty, as a minister, was to urge the fulfilment of her solemn promise to the absent lover. Nor could he, in any event, be guilty of the selfishness, as he termed it, of urging his own claims, and those of love.

Let us pass over much that followed. Elizabeth went only back to her school. She had a vague consciousness of wrong-doing, notwithstanding her high though mistaken sense of duty. She was only conscious of a nervous anxiety for her lover's return, and a wild desire to have her now developed to her lover.

Harvey returned to his duties. After the first shock had passed, he was not utterly despairing. The privilege that Elizabeth loved him, remained to his darkest hours. He, too, fervently longed to see her married, because then he believed he might satisfy her conscience with her noble intellect.

He grew in the favor of his people, and his fame extended afar. As the nightingale sings sweeter when the heavens are bright, so he, with his great sorrow ever nestling in his heart, gave forth nobler and more lofty and earnest utterances of hope. Life quickened and broadened before him. A thousand channels of usefulness and comparison opened before him, and those who pressed not the source of his rising popularity acknowledged and loved it.

Long ere Elizabeth returned again to Chichester, Harvey Bradford had acquired a calm and honorable position in the parlor of a city church. Here his sphere of usefulness he knew would be widened and enlarged. And he deemed it better to remove himself from the possibility of frequent contact with Elizabeth, until time should have calmed their feelings and taught them to be submissive to fate, not only, but an earnest love for their separate duties.

And so the years rolled on till two thirteen had passed away. Elizabeth had long since married. She had not been happy, except in her children, two of whom were now growing lovely and great in her household. She had written much, and the world had been delighted and surprised, not knowing that from her own heart she copied many of the pages which she had freely inscribed or entrusted to others. Perhaps she, too, sang sweeter for the thorn that pierced her heart.

Her husband had imported many graces from Europe, and some vices, which grew and were beauty and vices and disease. He was to Ellen Ellis neither so pure and lofty as Elizabeth. Perhaps knowing that Elizabeth's position seemed to be unfilled, Ellen was at times almost jealous. And the time often when all his property was squandered and that she and Sophie had left him, but the old homestead became the refuge of hate to his son, and the family lived solely upon the earnings of Elizabeth's pen.

Ellen was not jealous and still with Harvey Bradford. Illness and fame had crowned his career, and he was now in the very prime of his manhood, and scarcely at the meridian of life, there seemed nothing remaining to gild the descent more than what already seemed it. And if the rich and great delighted to honor him, the blessings of "the poor and those that were ready to perish" continually attended him. The rare and beautiful humility of his earlier years still lived in his heart toward him, and, all unconscious how sublime his life had been, he still moved on gently pursuing every duty and shrinking from no toil or responsibility. Men quoted him as the realization of the highest ideal of a Christian minister. Men knew the secret avenue, the unyielded to temptation, the high strength of his life.

Years had passed since he had once heard from the source of his early inspiration, Chichester. With a great struggle he had, long ago, given up the idea of a correspondence with Elizabeth, which had once been a favorite hope. He would do nothing to imperil her happiness. But now it happened that a friend from that old town was to be married, and Chichester was the world to which Harvey Bradford must speak at Christmas.

Once more he walked up the narrow aisle of the little church, where all was unchanged, and ascended the high pulpit. At first he feared his head would fail him in prayer, then looked around. In the Deacon's seat sat one of the Deacon Morrison's grandsons, and he had long since slept their long sleep. In Sophie's pew a female figure, in black and closely veiled, sat alone. Bradford's heart beat faster as he thought of Elizabeth, but the face of the veiled lady was not hers, and he knew not whether it were she.

Never had he preached better. A thousand thronging thoughts lent eloquence to his tongue, and held the audience entranced. At the close of the service a fund time had arrived that was to be baptized, and descending from the pulpit he stood before the communion table, shorn of every vestige of its former form. A little bowls took place at the door, a nurse came forward with her babe, and as Harvey poured the baptismal water from a silver vase, the veiled lady arose, and, with a quick, nervous movement, threw back her veil, and Bradford beheld Elizabeth. His voice faltered, but he had learned to repress emotion, and he went on and concluded the service. The nurse retired with the child, Elizabeth returned to her place, and not once had their eyes met.

As soon as the service was closed, Bradford was surrounded by some few crowd of old friends. Before their greetings were over Elizabeth had disappeared; but he learned that her husband had recently died suddenly, and that the little one whom he had baptized was her own and presence to the death.

Next day found him at Elizabeth's door. He spent some time with her, and though love was not mentioned between them there was no need to interpret by words the glad emotions which signalized the meeting of those long-parted spirits.

Elizabeth, in her deep seclusion, had not learned the art to preside with the world his very soul was his pulpit. Else she would gladly have spared him the agony of meeting her first at the altar.

It is necessary to tell how those long separated lives once merged into one? Is it necessary to assure the reader that they, as chastened by much sorrow and great trials. Did they, who had never shrunk from duty, nor denied a principle of truth, as they understood it, do fallest manifestation to their own conduct, level happy and peaceful lives? When love covered their joys, and though sorrows undeniably came and mingled in their cup, as they do in every cup crossed to human lips, they were holy here, and served to sweeten by blessed contrast all the remaining draught.

They were married in front of the old pulpit, by the pastor of Chichester, and once more Bradford looked upon Elizabeth as she sat in the deacon's pew, clothed in her quiet bridal garments; and it was no brilliant, not less beautiful than when, years ago, he first drew inspiration from the earnest light of her still undimmed eyes.

RECIPE FOR A MODERN GENT.

If it takes nine tailors to make a man, it must take a double number to make a gentleman—we mean a modern one—because that biped deems himself the very quintessence of elegance and fine exterior. And being it is you, dear reader, I will tell you that he cares nothing for interior beauty, the beauty of mind; because it don't show! But to our recipe:

Take one glossy, beaver hat, one jet-black moustache, one yard-wide neck tie, one flashy silk vest, one shanghai coat, the finer the cloth the better, one bandbox-ful rudeness of pattern, one pair of straw-colored kids, one pair of tight "inexpressibles," (in common parlance "pantaloons,") and one pair of excruciating patent leathers.

Place them all in apple-pie order on some brainless goose in human form; and, lo! you possess a modern gent. Plant a jet walking cane betwixt his lily digitals, and set him promenading in Broadway.

His soul will be one "Sandiness," fall into "emulsion fits" at the sight of a pretty ankle, and imagine himself in the seventh heaven of delight when he can but touch the hem of a lady's garment. Such is the "real lady" who glances contemptuously on his foppish person! He thinks "she is very pretty, too, very well and heavy." Poor dunce! can't some one pity him? I can't!

SOLANTHE.

OWEGO, April, 1856.

TURTLE FISHING IN THE EAST.

Many have heard of the Newera, a fish whose ire entices man, in old times believed to be sufficient to step an angry if it attached itself to the ship. The fisherman take with them in their small light boat, a tub containing a supply of these fishes. It is necessary to premise, for the edification of those who are not acquainted with the organization of a remora, that there is an oval plate at the top of its head, with a soft fleshy circumference. Within this is a very regular series of ridges of firm pieces of bone, disposed in two regular rows across the top of the head. These pieces are capable of movement like the back of the skid of appropriate machine, as the ladies of moveable wooden blinds are made to open or shut so as to admit the sun's rays by pulling the adjusting string, or by the impulse of the new glass ventilators. The fine edges of the remora, when in different positions of the grass vary from fifteen to thirty-six, are armed with small hooks, which can be all raised at once by the will, in the word-end. When the tail of each of these living tackles in the tube is fastened a ring ready for the attachment of a cord, which, though fine, is long and strong. All being ready, the fisherman bides his time till he gets sight of a turtle comfortably basking in a deep calm on the surface within the fisher's distance. Noiselessly, then, does he slip one of his corded remoras overboard, and the fish, illprovided with the fine sensibilities of man, makes instantly for the turtle, while the fisherman, almost equally fish, draws his breath, pays out the line. Away goes the remora, and when it stops stay, till it anchors on the plastron of the unsuspecting victim. The latter encounters the patient demeanor required by all of the finny tribe at first time." When he thinks the marine squatter has settled himself comfortable enough he hauls away, and the surprised turtle finds itself on board the boat, where a grub applied from behind the head by the fisherman's remora, when the turtle is laid upon its back, aroundon action, at the bottom of the boat, and the remora is released, to be left to himself, and, cold-blooded as it is, to relate its adventure and the unaccompanying treatment to which it has been subjected. How many mortals are treated by the great like this poor remora, and, having answered the prize for them, are returned to their tub till "next time!"

A DEATH-BELL.

A pretty story is told of the casting of a bell for the church of St. Magdalen, at Breslau. When the metal was just ready to be poured into the mould the chief founder went to discover, by careful observation, under pain of death, to touch the vent by which the metal was conveyed. The youth, curious to see the operation, disobeyed orders, and the stroke of the metal ran into the mould, and the enraged master, returning from his meal, slew the apprentice with a single blow. On hearing the sound, he found that he had been too hasty, for the bell was cast as perfectly as possible. When it was hung in its place, the master-founder was condemned to death by the sword for the murder of the apprentice, and he entreated the authorities that he might be allowed to hear the first chime he died. His petition was granted, and the bell has since been rung at every execution.

AMBITION'S FATE.

In the historic page, And of course find hundreds of men celebrated in their victories: amongst others, Alexander, Philip, Cæsar, Hannibal, Pompey, Anthony, Pyrrhus, Sylla, Sesacus, and, in your own time, Napoleon. But it is equally true, that in all campaigns, the conduct of all and each of these individuals was governed by ambition, not patriotism—personal aggrandizement, not the good of their subjects or fellow-countrymen. And what were their several rewards? Alexander and Hannibal a cup of poison; Anthony died the death of a suicide; Pyrrhus was killed by a brick, thrown by a Spartan woman; Sylla was killed by vermin; Philip, Cæsar, Pompey and Sesacus were assassinated; and Napoleon died on the rock of St. Helena, an exile from his country.

THE OCEAN OF LIFE.

BY TAMAR ANNE KEMMOD.

We are voyagers all towards the silent Land,
Pilgrims crossing Life's restless main;
When first we embark on the mighty deep,
The sun sinks bright on the ripples soft strain.
Some soon on with a skilful hand,
Day after day 'mouth a cloudless sky
No angry billows ever toss their barque.
But soft, gentle zephyrs around them fly;
They quietly cross the trackless sea,
And drop anchor on reaching eternity.

And others will meet the surging tide,
While the huge waves roar and tempests knell,
In maddened fury around them play,
And they look in vain for a sky serene.
Slowly they guide their trembling barque,
As lightnings and storms 'midst the foaming spray,
And with hands all weary, and hearts all sad,
They hastily pass on their weary way.
Till Faith's bright star sheds its brilliant light.
On an anchorage safe, which they grasp with delight.

BALTIMORE, Md., April, 1855.

THE TWO NEPHEWS.

COMPILED FROM A PHYSICIAN'S DIARY.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

My friend and classmate, Edward Warland, had got married and settled down, and on the first opportunity I paid him a visit. He had married Nancy Gates, one of the best and the fairest girls in the country—a bright-eyed laughter-loving creature, with a heart as pure and noble as her face was fair and lovely. I found Ned domiciled in a love of a cottage, over the front door and windows of which sweet honey-suckles clustered, and before which was spread out a pretty garden. Nancy met me at the door, and with a joyous smile she gave me her hand, and conducted me to the neat little parlor where the perfume of roses fairly burdened the air. "What a happy fellow Ned must be," I said to myself, as the fairy who reigned there swept after her husband.

Ned came in with a warm smile upon his face, and in a very few moments we were engaged in a lively conversation. We talked over the scenes of our childhood days, and then Ned and I chatted about some of our college scrapes. And so the afternoon passed away. After supper Nancy challenged me to a game of chess, and beat me. Ned said I let her beat me on purpose, but I did not. I may have sat down with that intention, but before the game was half through I found I had more than my match.

One thing I had noticed which puzzled me,—or, at least, which excited my curiosity. Every once in a while Ned would fall into a fit of moody thought, and when I spoke to him he would start up, and I could see that his cheerfulness cost him an effort. I was determined to know what this meant for I had my suspicions, and I wished to know if they were correct. So I asked him what was the cause of his trouble.

"Ah," he uttered, "have you noticed anything out of the way?"

"No," I told him; "not out of the way, though in any arise from something that is out of the way."

"Well, well," he returned, "it is nothing which I need to conceal from my friends, for they must all know it some day. My uncle Mark has made a new will, and cut me off without a penny. It is not the money I care about, for he may do with that as he pleases; though I will own that I had hoped a part of it might be mine. But to lose the old man's friendship is what galls me most. I have loved him—loved him well."

"But why is it?" I asked in some surprise, "I thought the old man regarded you almost in the same light as a child of his own."

"So he did," returned Ned.

"Let me explain," interrupted Nancy, in a tremulous tone. "He has thus turned him off because he married with me."

"Impossible," I uttered.

"But it is possible," said Ned. "He asked me once if I meant to do so. I acknowledged my wife, and I told him yes. Then he told me I should not. Of course I could accept no distinction in this matter. But when he had got me all worked up with excitement, he told me he would cut me out of his will forever if I made the boy my wife. I simply told him that the earth never bore money enough upon its bosom to buy the fair girl from me, and then he bade me leave him. Since I have been married I have received a note from him informing me that I should never enter his threshold again. Now you know it all."

"But," said I, "some one must have put him up to this. To whom will he leave his property?"

"To Thomas Needham?"

"Yes."

"I did not know that Thomas had returned from Germany."

"O, yes," said Ned, "he came back six months ago."

I said no more on the subject then, for I did not wish to express any suspicions that might be unfounded. Mark Needham was an old man, and very wealthy. He had been married years before, but his wife died young without children; so Mark grew old with only the children of other people about him. Once he had a brother and sister, both of whom were now dead. The brother had left a child named Thomas, while the sister had married a man named Warland, and left Edward, who was now just five-and-twenty. Thomas Needham was five years older; and both were now orphans. Ned was by far the best of the two, and people loved him the best; and I was not a little surprised to learn that his uncle had discarded him and preferred Thomas. But I hoped to understand it better.

It was quite late when I left the young couple, and it was a long while after I retired to my bed before I slept. I called to mind the sweet face of Nancy Warland, and then I wondered that the manager of more than one of my uncle could have anything against her. I knew that in days gone by there had been a deadly feud between him and a certain Benjamin Gates, and that this hatred had run so high that Gates had sworn an oath upon the Bible that he would learn his children to hate and despise Mark Needham, and that they should be taught to spurn him as they would a viper. And this Benjamin Gates had been a cousin—a second cousin, I think—of Nancy's father. Of course I could not suppose that uncle Mark would for this circumstance so influence him that he would turn his vengeance upon a child of his enemy's most distant relative. However, I resolved to fathom it if I could, for, to tell the plain truth, I had some suspicion of foul play on the part of the elder nephew.

It was about a week after my visit to Ned Warland's that I received a call to go and visit Mark Needham. He was very sick, I was informed, and my attendance was required at once. When I reached the house I found the old man in his bed, and looking quite unwell. I found his skin dry and hot, his pulse fluttering, and his tongue very much inflamed, but not yet coated. He complained of pain in the back of his head, and so along down on the spinal column.

I asked him what he had been eating. He assured me that he had eaten nothing that could have hurt him. At any rate, I knew that his stomach was very foul, and I feared that the bowels were inflamed. I administered my powerful emetic; left a simple sedative, and then gave directions for supplying a hot bath to the surface. I took my leave, promising to call again in the morning of the next day.

As I descended the first stairs I met Thomas Needham in the hall. He was a dark and handsome, thirty years of age, and not such an one as I should have expected to see always after his business. The darkness of his skin was in all probability caused by exposure in travelling; but then there was a shade of deeper tinge than this which was apparent at least to me.

"How do you find my uncle?" he asked, with an expression of countenance which I could see at once was forced. Ah! he shouldn't have tried to look so concerned, because it was not natural to him, and I could see beneath it at once.

I informed him that I found the old man very sick, and that the utmost care would be necessary in his nursing.

"You must do your best, doctor," the scapegrace returned, "for I would not like to have him die now."

When I got away from the house I wished that Thomas Needham had not spoken those last words as he did, for they gave me a dark suspicion which I did not like to hold. I feared that the uncle would be neglected, and that the dark nephew would not hesitate to help him along over the eternal highway if he could. Yet, as much as I disliked the fellow, I tried to banish these suspicions.

After I had retired to my bed that night I dreamed a very curious dream. I thought that old Mark Needham had engaged a new physician, and that I detected that physician giving a deadly poison for medicine. I caught the doctor's hand, and as he turned his face towards me I knew that it was Benjamin Gates. I awoke, and felt glad that 'twas only a dream. Then I went asleep again, and dreamed the very same dream once more.

In the morning I went up to see Uncle Mark again. I found him more weak than on the night before. His tongue was more inflamed; his skin more hot; his pulse small and hard, and pains shooting through his whole body. He informed me that he could keep nothing on his stomach—not even the gentle sedatives which I had given.

Was it strange that my dream should have come back to my mind then? It did come—and with a force, too. I acknowledge it with a quick emetic, but it was thrown off in an instant. I then informed him that I must use the stomach-pump. He bade me use anything that would relieve him of the dreadful pain he suffered. I adjusted the pump, and having placed him in a proper position, I introduced the flexible tube, and then commenced the work. I threw down my fears of poison about half a pint of thick matter, and in a moment half a pint of the pleasure of nausea! I removed all I could from the tube. I prepared the mixture I desire I had at hand, and having called the old housekeeper I bade her prepare as quickly as possible some barley-water, and gave her the same. When this came I administered copious draughts of it, and determined to remain by until I could know how the result would come.

"Who watched with you last night?" I asked, after the patient had become more easy.

"Thomas was with me most of the night—and the night before, too," returned the old man. "He is very attentive."

"Very!" I responded. But I wished not to make much conversation then, and I called the old housekeeper out.

"Thomas is very attentive to his uncle, is he not?" I said to her.

"Yes," she returned, with a shrug of the shoulders.

I could easily interpret that motion; and by a few careful questions I discovered that she disliked the dark nephew very much, and that she had reason for so doing. I then knew that I might trust her, and having obtained from her a pledge of secrecy, I told her what I had discovered. She was horror-struck at the fearful revelation, but she was not at all incredulous.

"I never thought any better of him," she said, earnestly. "And only to think that dear, good Edward should have been turned off for this stretch."

"Never mind," I said. "I think all may come out right yet. If you can contrive that Thomas shall administer no more medicine to his uncle between now and to-morrow at this time I can do the rest. Yet you must act in this matter, for in order to prove the wickedness we must catch him at it. You will know how to do this. Look for things as he pleases, only be careful that nothing from his hands reaches the old man's lips.

The old woman promised, and then I took my leave. I did not see Thomas on that visit, and I supposed he kept himself out of the way on purpose.

I need not say with what anxiety I waited for the coming of the next morning. But it came, and as soon as I had swallowed my breakfast I started for Mark Needham's. I met the housekeeper in the hall, and she pulled me in the parlor at once; and then, without a word of explanation, she went into another room, and when she returned she had two teacups in her hands.

"There, doctor," she said, all anxious excitement, "last night Thomas would watch a part of the night, but I kept myself wide awake, and all he did. These two cups were on the sideboard with the barley-water and gruel in them. I saw Thomas empty some stuff out of a little phial into them; but the old man has not touched them. As soon as I could get my self out of the room I took the cups and emptied them just where the others were I caught them up and hurried out. But I didn't have my trick alluded to, for in half an hour afterward the old man waked up and wanted some drink. Then Thomas took the cup of barley-water and stirred it up well, and gave it to him!"

"What was it in the phial?" I asked. "Was it a liquid?"

"He sat hard to knock on the phial with his finger to make the stuff run out," the woman said.

"Then of course it must have been a powder," said I.

I then asked the woman to bring me a shovel full of coals from the fire-place, together with another room, and the coals were soon brought. Then I stirred up the contents of one of the cups and upon pouring a few drops upon the burning coals a whitish vapor arose which gave us the smell of garlick mak and strong! Oh! guess I know that we had arrested—and in large quantity, too! I bade the woman keep the cup very carefully, and then I went up to the old man's chamber. Thomas had gone out about half an hour before.

I found my patient very comfortable, and able to sit up in bed. His pulse was nearly regular. The heat was gone from his skin, and his tongue looked more natural. I informed him that I should not call again that day or two, and then we entered into a conversation.

"Uncle Mark," said I, as soon as I could bring the matter in without seeming to reach for after it, "what is Edward Warland up to?"

"Don't mention him," uttered the old man, nervously.

"But why not?" I returned. "I look upon him as one of the most noble-hearted, generous men in the country."

"What! you, too, married?" asked Mark, warmly.

"I have looked at his wife," I answered, "and I don't think there is another woman in the land that could have made him so happy."

"But he should have married her rich. She is the child of my most deadly enemy, and has been taught to curse me!"

"What?" I cried, in very unpleasant surprise. "Nancy Warland taught to curse you? Who told you this?"

"I know it, doctor."

"But who told you that she was the child of your enemy?"

"Thomas told me of it."

"And the villain lied to you!" I cried, now thoroughly aroused. "Nancy Gates—now Nancy Warland—is the child of Arthur Gates?"

"What?—A—Arthur——"

"Aye," I added as the old man stammered in his wonder, "the child of Arthur Gates; and she is hardly a relative of the Benjamin Gates against whom you have such a deadly enmity."

"Then Thomas must have been mistaken," the old man said; and he trembled while he spoke.

I was determined now to tell the man all I knew. His own safety demanded it, for a villain like Thomas Needham could not be watched all the time, while he had his liberty. So I commenced and told him the fearful story. I did not break it to him suddenly, but I opened it gradually, letting the light in by degrees, and finally wound up by relating the discovery of the house-keeper, and my analysis of what she found. During this recital the old man was fearfully moved, and when it was concluded he started up and caught me by the arm. He was pale as death, and his eye seemed half starting from his head.

"My God, sir!" he gasped. "is this thing possible?"

"It is," I answered. "Perhaps you are more surprised than I was. But when I knew you had discarded poor Ned simply because he had married Nancy Gates, I felt sure Thomas had been deceiving you. On the first visit I made you I went home with a terrible fear. I saw the wicked nephew then, and from his manner I knew he was anxious for your death; but I did not then think of this. I only feared then that he would contrive to prevent your recovery through some kind of neglect."

But the old man was not in a state to endure much contemplation, so I left him, promising to call again on the morning of the next day.

So on the next morning I called, and I found Mark Needham in his great arm-chair.

"Doctor," he said, as soon as I had taken a seat, "here is a letter I received an hour ago. Will you read it?"

I took the note, and read as follows: —

"UNCLE MARK.—You know me now, and I am aware you won't want to see me again. I have played a high hand for your money, and lost. Curse that doctor! Had he kept away you'd have been a dead man, and I a rich man, by this time. You may hunt for me, but you won't find me, for I have more than money enough to leave the country with, and shall be sure ere you get this. Your Nephew,

THOMAS NEEDHAM.

"But how did he discover that he was detected?" I asked, as I finished reading the characteristic note.

"He overheard a conversation between my house-keeper and myself," answered the old man.

"She was explaining to me what she saw while hidden in the entry, and Thomas was in that same entry then. I told her what you had told me, with about the poison and about Edward, and he must have heard it all. And," he continued, in a tremulous tone, "I am glad he did, for I do believe I should have died if I came to accuse him. Oh! I have been very foolish—very; but I can make it all up now. I will and would not be so to Ned. Where can I go to negotiate my to come?"

"Nowhere that was a pleasant business for me. I fixed up such restoratives, both of food and drink, as I wanted my patient to take, and then went off. I found Ned and his wife just sitting down to dinner. They made me eat with them, and when we were done I told them my errand. I told them the whole story from beginning to end.

"And so," I concluded, "your uncle is not so much to blame after all. We could hardly wonder at his being angry with you when he thought you had married a child of Benjamin Gates."

Nancy Warland came direct to where I sat, and without a word of explanation she placed her face for white arms about my neck and kissed me. But Ned was not jealous—not at all. He was very happy, though I could see that there was a pang of grief in his soul. He had some thought, among all the rest, of his uncle Mark.

However, Ned promised to go and see his uncle, and then I took my leave. On the following morning I called to see the old man again, and found him well. He was not yet strong, but he needed no more of my care.

I heard from Ned next I was out, and it was not until the week following that I found time to call upon Uncle Mark again. This time I found him happy and cheerful, and a tear of joy stood in his eye as he told me that Ned had promised to come and live with him.

Time passed on, and somewhere about a year after the events I have recorded a Paris paper announced the death of Thomas Needham. Some papers were described which were found upon his person, and we knew that the dark nephew was dead!

But there was joy in the old mansion when this cloud had passed away. Not long since I paid a visit to Ned. I found Nancy busy playing with Ned's child, and it puzzled me to tell which laughed the most like a child.

I was invited to supper, and Nancy went out to superintend the preparing of a dessert.

"Look at her," uttered the old man, pointing towards the retiring form. "Aren't she a woman to love? Oh—she's an angel—an angel, doctor. And only think how near I came to losing her!"

"And yourself, too," I whispered.

"Yes," he added, with a slight tremulousness in his tone. "But never mind—we're happy now. It's love all around; and as for sunshine—why, there's enough in Nancy's smiles for the whole household."

WHAT BECOMES OF THEM!

Within six months, no less than sixteen persons have disappeared in this city, of whom not a single trace has been found. Four ladies thus far remains shrouded in an impenetrable mystery. One of the missing persons was the wife of a millionaire, a young man of irreproachable habits, who was last seen on his way home from a party, and not many rods from his own door. And yet the disappearance of so suddenly and mysteriously from the frequented streets, as the guilt of old era said to have vanished from before the eyes of the omnipotent. Oh! men disappear; women disappear; young men and maidens disappear: and these fearful horrors are looked upon by our police as a matter of course—as things with which they have nothing to do, and which, on the whole, are rather pleasant than otherwise—thinking, perhaps, that they render an equivalent by sedulously maintaining themselves in a state of everlasting disappearance.

HOUSE RENTS.

There is a general outcry this year at the exorbitant rents charged for dwelling houses. Such a clamor as could have been heard five years ago for $250, now commands from $400 to $500. So stupendous, in fact, have rents become, that it is almost impossible for a man of limited means to secure a comfortable habitation for his family within a manageable distance of his place of business.

In what is this tendency to end? Must respectable people be compelled to herd like prairie dogs, or live in attics and cellars? Shall married men, of limited means, be driven from the city altogether? Our landlords must beware, lest, in clutching for too greedy a gripe, they frighten the geese, which lay their golden eggs, to other coops.

A REDBREAST FAMILY.

A redbreast built her nest in some ivy against a garden wall, and laid four eggs. One day a man, while trimming the ivy, cut so close with his shears that the nest was injured, and in consequence of it the four little eggs fell to the ground. The lady of the house hearing noise of sore distress from the garden, ran out to the scene of the disaster. Alas, the poor birds could not restore their lost treasures to the nest. But the lady could; she picked up the little nest and fallen eggs, found on making the damaged nest, and were still and cold upon the ground. The lady was afraid they were dead; but she took them up and carried them into the house, where by the warmth of her hand and the fire they were soon in a state of life. Then she tried to patch the nest with a piece of soft woolen cloth, but it was a bungling business she found; so small and fine and beautiful fabric of a bird's handiwork: she did the best she could however, and carried the nest and the eggs home; and then she and her son were watching with tender concern from the neighboring bushes, returned to their precious charge: and they were far less frightened than before.

Were the redbreasts' trials over? A few days more of the drenching rain set in, and the rain so completely soaked the nest and the cloth put to its line it, that the little ones were nearly drowned, and found the nest becoming quite dead, the lady thought. What was to be done now? There was no remedy. The little nest was now pulled down, having fairly proved an unsafe nursery for the brood, and a new one was built in the cage of the empty canary bird in a currant-bush a few yards from the wall where the old one was, and there the brood was married. All the while the old birds were perched near by without showing symptoms of anxiety or alarm, but, watching eagerly, and seeming to look very thankful for the kindness help which had been extended to them. As soon as their young ones were housed in the dry nest they directly followed, and henceforth nothing happened to harm or terrify them. In peace and comfort they passed the warm days, until, when fledged, they were ready to fly out in the great world on their own account.

What a happy world this would be if we would all endeavor to help our fellow-beings when they "fall" as the kind lady helped the family of redbreasts!

PARENTAL AUTHORITY.

The true relation between parent and child is little understood. We hear much of the bad behavior of children to their parents. And this observation compels us to acknowledge that there is an alarming deficiency of respect for parental authority. We think parents are strongly inclined to the belief that the main fault, in this respect, lies in the child than in his parents. We have rarely seen a child who had been rightly managed in his earlier life, who was not both respectful and obedient. How often do we hear a weakly indulgent mother say of her darling reprobate, whose pecuniary outbreaks keep the whole house in an uproar, and who is constantly committing some breach against good breeding, or the peace of the household, "Dear little fellow, it is only the exuberant spirits of the child. When he becomes older he will see the folly of all this, and correct himself." And so the child is growing that wild exuberance, and curbing that surging spirit, he suffers all that is noble in him to go to rack and ruin for want of proper training.

Let us apply this method to the physical frame. A fever seizes on the boy. His face is flushed, his eyes are bloodshot, tongue is palace accelerated, his tongue badly coated, and he is restless and excited, and one find no sleep. And the disagreeable symptoms are referred to the mother, but she, with astonishing nonchalance, exclaims, "Oh, this is only the excess of physical life, and vital force. He will outgrow it, and it will not be any permanent injury to him." What should we think of such an author? Nay, what would she not do for her darling child? What would she not endure in watching and tending him? Because it would hurt the precious one? Would she say to the physician, who had ordered a nauseating draught, "Oh, he don't want to take that, and therefore he shall be indulged." "But he will die, madam," expostulates the good doctor. "No matter, it will hurt his feelings, and I have resolved that he shall never be made to do what he don't wish to do. If you can cure the medicine down his throat, well and good, but he shall never be compelled to swallow it."

This is not the way fond mothers talk or act in such a case. They then have firmness enough to do, and to compel their child to do what seems so essential to the preservation of its life. But this is precisely the way very fond mothers do in reference to the moral maladies of their offspring.